THE DAILY BREAD

The Mission of the Apostles

Evangelization Without Being Insufferable

A FORMATION BOOK BY

Kendall Peterson

The Everyday Apostle

THE DAILY BREAD

The Mission of the Apostles

Evangelization

Without Being Insufferable

✦ ✦ ✦

A Daily Bread Formation Book

The Everyday Apostle

INTRODUCTION

The Word Nobody Wants to Hear

For many Catholics, the word evangelization lands with a small inward cringe. It conjures images they want no part of: the street-corner preacher shouting at passersby, the pushy acquaintance who turns every conversation into a sales pitch for his religion, the smug believer who seems to regard everyone else as a project. Most normal people do not want to be that person, and so, sensibly recoiling from the obnoxious caricature, they conclude that evangelization is not for them and quietly opt out of sharing their faith at all. This is an understandable reaction, and it is a disaster, because in fleeing the caricature they abandon the real thing, which is nothing like it.

This book is for the man who knows he is called to share his faith but recoils from everything the word evangelization has come to suggest, and who needs to be shown that the obnoxious version is not the real version but a distortion of it. The truth is that effective evangelization is almost the opposite of the insufferable caricature: it is winsome rather than pushy, relational rather than confrontational, marked far more by listening than by talking, and carried more by the attractiveness of a life than by the force of an argument. A man does not have to become someone he would despise in order to share his faith; he has to become, in fact, someone more worth being around, not less.

Let your speech always be gracious, seasoned with salt, so that you may know how you ought to answer each person. — Colossians 4:6

We will begin by naming clearly what evangelization is and what it is not, rescuing it from the caricature. We will see why the attractiveness of a life is the real engine of evangelization, and why the relationship must usually come before the message. We will learn the lost art of listening, which is more persuasive than talking, and how to tell the story of one's own faith simply and without pretension. We will take up the matter of timing, of reading when to speak and when to stay silent, and how to leave doors open rather than slamming them shut. And we will see that the goal is never to win an argument but to draw a person, gently and over time, toward the Christ a man has found.

CHAPTER ONE

What Evangelization Is Not

Rescuing the Word From the Caricature

Before a man can embrace evangelization, he has to be freed from the false picture of it that makes him recoil, for the thing he is recoiling from is not evangelization at all but its counterfeit. The obnoxious, pushy, argumentative version that gives the whole enterprise a bad name is a distortion, and a man who thinks that is what he is being called to will either refuse the call or, worse, accept it and become insufferable. Clearing away the caricature is the necessary first step, and it turns out that most of what people hate about evangelization is precisely what real evangelization is not.

Always be prepared to make a defense… yet do it with gentleness and respect. — 1 Peter 3:15

Not a Sales Pitch

Evangelization is not a sales pitch, and the man who approaches it as one, treating his faith as a product to be aggressively marketed and every person as a prospect to be closed, has fundamentally misunderstood it. The salesman's posture, with its relentless pushing, its refusal to take no for an answer, its treatment of the other person as a target rather than a soul, is almost perfectly calculated to repel, and it is the very thing that has made so many people allergic to being evangelized. Real evangelization is not about pushing a product but about sharing something one has found and loves, more like a man telling a friend about a restaurant that changed his life than a salesman working a quota. The difference is felt immediately by the other person, who can always tell whether he is being loved or being worked, whether he is a soul being cared for or a sale being pursued. The moment evangelization becomes a sales pitch, it has already failed, and the man who would evangelize well must purge from himself every trace of the salesman's grasping posture.

Not Winning Arguments

Evangelization is not about winning arguments, and the man who imagines that his job is to out-debate the unbeliever, to marshal unanswerable proofs and corner his opponent into submission, has mistaken the whole nature of the thing. People are very rarely argued into faith; a man may lose every debate and still not be moved an inch, because the deepest obstacles to faith are seldom intellectual, and even when a man is intellectually defeated he resents the defeat and digs in rather than converting. Faith is not finally a conclusion reached at the end of a winning argument but a response of the whole person to something that has drawn him, and the argumentative evangelist, however clever, usually produces not converts but adversaries. This does not mean reasons do not matter, for they do, and a man should be able to give them; it means that the goal is never to win but to draw, and that a man who approaches evangelization as a debate to be won has guaranteed that he will lose the only thing that matters, which is the person.

Not Judging or Condemning

Evangelization is not an exercise in judgment or condemnation, and the man who comes across as looking down on others, as regarding the unbeliever as a sinner to be scolded or a fool to be corrected, has adopted precisely the posture that drives people furthest from the faith. Nothing repels like the sense of being judged, and the believer who radiates disapproval, who seems to regard himself as superior and others as moral projects beneath him, makes the faith he represents look like what its enemies accuse it of being, a religion of self-righteous condemnation. Real evangelization comes from exactly the opposite posture: from a man who knows himself to be a sinner saved by mercy, who looks on others not with judgment but with the compassion of one beggar telling another where to find bread. The evangelist who has grasped his own need of mercy cannot condemn, for he knows he stands on the same ground as everyone he speaks to, and it is precisely this humility, this absence of judgment, that makes his witness attractive rather than repellent. Evangelization done from a posture of superiority is not evangelization at all but its opposite, and the first thing a man must shed is any trace of looking down.

It is worth adding that this judging posture often hides from the man who holds it, dressing itself as concern or zeal. A believer rarely thinks of himself as looking down on others; he thinks of himself as caring about the truth, standing for what is right, warning people for their own good. But the other person does not experience it as care; they experience it as contempt, however it is intended, and the gap between the believer's self-image and the impression he actually makes is where many well-meaning Christians do their worst damage. A man must therefore examine not only his words but the posture beneath them, asking honestly whether, under the concern, there is a quiet sense of superiority leaking out, because the people he hopes to reach will feel it long before he admits it to himself.

CHAPTER TWO

The Attractive Life

Why Who You Are Comes First

Having cleared away the caricature, we can state the positive truth that stands at the center of all real evangelization: that the most powerful thing a man has to offer is not his arguments or his words but his life, the visible attractiveness of a life transformed by Christ. People are drawn to the faith far more by what they see than by what they hear, and the man whose life is genuinely good, joyful, and different becomes an evangelist simply by being himself. Who a man is comes before and counts for more than anything he says.

Let your light shine before others, so that they may see your good works and give glory to your Father who is in heaven. — Matthew 5:16

The Life That Raises Questions

The most effective evangelization usually begins not with a word but with a question that arises in another person's mind when they observe a Christian whose life is genuinely different and genuinely good. When a man lives with a peace that his circumstances do not explain, a joy that does not depend on his comforts, an integrity that costs him, a love that asks nothing in return, the people around him notice, and sooner or later some of them wonder what accounts for it. This wondering is the beginning of evangelization, the question that a transformed life raises in the minds of those who watch it, and it is a question the man's words can then answer. The goal of a man's life, evangelistically speaking, is to be the kind of person who raises this question, whose way of living is attractive and puzzling enough that others begin to ask what is behind it. A man cannot argue people into this curiosity, but he can live in such a way that it arises on its own, and a life that raises the question is worth more than a thousand unprompted arguments.

Attraction, Not Promotion

There is a deep principle here that the saints understood and that modern evangelists often forget: that the faith spreads most powerfully by attraction rather than by promotion, by being made beautiful and desirable rather than by being pushed. People are not drawn to what is marketed at them but to what they find genuinely attractive, and the faith is spread most effectively not by those who promote it aggressively but by those who embody it so attractively that others want what they have. This shifts the whole burden of evangelization from technique to character, from learning how to push the faith to becoming the kind of person whose life makes the faith look like what it is, good news, the answer to the longings every human heart carries. A man evangelizes by attraction when his life is so evidently good and joyful and whole that others are drawn toward its source, and this is a far more powerful and far less obnoxious form of evangelization than any amount of promotion. Make the faith attractive by living it beautifully, and it will draw people more surely than any sales pitch ever could.

Integrity Is the Precondition

All of this rests on integrity, on the correspondence between what a man professes and how he actually lives, for nothing destroys a witness faster than the perception of hypocrisy. The watching world is quick to notice the gap between a Christian's words and his life, and a believer whose conduct contradicts his profession not only fails to evangelize but actively repels, confirming the suspicion that the faith is a pretense and its adherents frauds. Conversely, the believer whose life matches his words, whose faith visibly shapes his actual behavior, possesses a credibility that gives everything he says weight. Integrity is therefore the precondition of all evangelization, the foundation without which no amount of eloquence will avail; a man must be, in private and in the unglamorous details of his life, what he claims to be in public, or his witness will ring hollow. This is humbling, for it means the work of evangelization begins not with learning what to say to others but with becoming, oneself, a man whose life can bear the weight of the faith he professes, and it is pointless to attend to the former while neglecting the latter.

None of this requires a man to be perfect before he can witness, which would silence everyone, for no one's life fully matches his profession. What it requires is honesty rather than perfection: that a man own his failures rather than hide them, that he be seen to be striving and repenting rather than pretending, that the direction of his life visibly bend toward what he professes even where he falls short. People do not expect a Christian to be flawless, and a believer who admits his struggles is far more credible than one who projects a false perfection. The hypocrisy that repels is not the gap between a man's ideals and his achievement, which everyone shares, but the pretense that there is no gap, the performance of a holiness he does not have. Honest imperfection witnesses; dishonest perfection repels.

CHAPTER THREE

Relationship Before Message

The Soil in Which Faith Grows

One of the great practical mistakes in evangelization is to lead with the message before there is any relationship to carry it, to deliver the content of the faith to people with whom one has no real bond, which almost always fails. The faith is most often transmitted through relationships of genuine love and trust, and the message is received when it comes from someone the hearer knows cares about them. A man who grasps this stops trying to evangelize strangers with arguments and starts investing in the relationships through which real evangelization actually happens.

We were ready to share with you not only the gospel of God but also our own selves, because you had become very dear to us. — 1 Thessalonians 2:8

People Receive the Message From People They Trust

The message of the faith is almost always received not in the abstract but from a particular person the hearer knows and trusts, which means the relationship is not incidental to evangelization but essential to it. People are moved toward faith overwhelmingly through someone they already know and respect, a friend, a family member, a coworker whose life they have watched and whose care for them they trust, far more than through strangers or arguments encountered in the abstract. This is simply how human beings receive important truths about life: not from faceless sources but from people they trust, in the context of relationships that have earned a hearing. The evangelist who understands this invests first in genuine relationships, earning trust and demonstrating real care, knowing that only within such a relationship will his words about the faith be truly received. The message needs a messenger the hearer trusts, and building that trust, through real friendship and genuine love, is the patient foundational work of evangelization that the impatient skip at the cost of everything.

Love First, and Really

The relationships through which evangelization happens must be marked by genuine love, real care for the person as a person, and not merely by a strategic friendliness aimed at converting them, for people can tell the difference and resent being treated as projects. There is a counterfeit of evangelical friendship in which a man befriends someone precisely in order to convert them, with an agenda hidden beneath the appearance of care, and this instrumental friendship is both dishonest and ineffective, because the other person eventually senses that they are being handled rather than loved. Real evangelization requires real love, caring about the person for their own sake, being a genuine friend whether or not they ever come to faith, loving them with no strings attached. Paradoxically, it is precisely this unconditional love, this friendship that is real and not a means to an end, that most effectively draws people toward the faith, because they experience in it something they rarely encounter and cannot explain. A man must love people really, then, not as prospects but as friends, and let the evangelization flow from the genuine relationship rather than using the relationship as a tool.

The Patience of Long Investment

Evangelization through relationship is slow work, requiring a patience that the results-hungry find difficult, for the building of trust and the drawing of a person toward faith often takes years rather than moments. A man must be willing to invest in a relationship over a long time, to be a faithful friend across seasons, to let the question of faith arise naturally and be addressed gradually, rather than forcing the pace and ruining the relationship. This patience is itself a form of love and trust in God, a willingness to plant and water without demanding to see the harvest, to be one who sows faithfully and leaves the increase to God and to time. The man who understands evangelization as the patient investment of a lifetime, rather than a transaction to be completed quickly, is freed from the anxious pushing that repels, and can simply love people well over the long haul, trusting that the relationship he is building is the very soil in which faith, in God's time, may eventually grow. Much real evangelization bears its fruit only after many years, and the man who would do it must settle in for the long and patient work of love.

CHAPTER FOUR

The Lost Art of Listening

Why the Ears Convert More Than the Mouth

If there is one practical skill that separates the effective evangelist from the insufferable one, it is listening, the humble and genuine attention to the other person that most believers, in their eagerness to speak, entirely neglect. The caricature of the evangelist is all mouth and no ears, a man who talks at people, and the reality of effective evangelization is almost the reverse, a man who listens far more than he speaks and who earns, through listening, the right to be heard. Recovering the lost art of listening is among the most important things a man can do to share his faith well.

Let every person be quick to hear, slow to speak. — James 1:19

Listening Earns the Right to Speak

The man who listens genuinely to another person, who attends to their story, their struggles, their questions, and their objections with real interest, earns in doing so the right to be heard that the man who only talks never acquires. People will not receive the faith from someone who has not first received them, who has not listened to who they are and what they carry; the willingness to listen is what signals genuine care and opens the other person to hear, in turn, what the listener has to say. The eager evangelist who launches into his message without first listening comes across as not caring about the person at all, only about delivering his content, and is rightly tuned out. But the man who listens first, patiently and genuinely, demonstrates that he values the person, and so creates the conditions in which his eventual words will be welcome. Listening is not merely a nicety but a strategy of love: it earns a hearing that cannot be seized by force, and the man who masters it finds that people open to him in a way they never would to a talker.

Understanding Before Answering

Genuine listening also allows a man to understand the actual person in front of him, their real questions and real obstacles, so that whatever he eventually says addresses them rather than some generic imagined objection. Every person's relationship to faith is particular, shaped by their own history, wounds, questions, and longings, and the man who listens discovers what is actually going on with this specific person, what is really keeping them from faith or drawing them toward it. The evangelist who does not listen delivers canned answers to questions no one asked, addressing an imaginary person rather than the real one; the evangelist who listens can speak to the actual heart of the matter, responding to the real obstacle or the real longing he has heard. This is why listening makes a man not only more winsome but more effective, for it lets him aim his words where they will actually land, at the real person with real concerns rather than at a stereotype. A man should therefore listen long before he speaks, seeking first to understand the person fully, and then to address what he has actually heard rather than what he assumed.

The Humility of Listening

Underlying the art of listening is a deep humility, the recognition that the other person is not a mere target for one's message but a whole human being worthy of genuine attention and respect, and this humility is itself part of the witness. The believer who listens communicates, beneath his words, that he regards the other person as valuable, that he is interested in them as a person and not merely as a conversion prospect, and this respectful attention is in itself attractive and even, in its way, evangelical, for it embodies the love it hopes to commend. The arrogance of the non-listener, who assumes he has everything to teach and nothing to learn, repels; the humility of the listener, who genuinely attends and is willing to be taught, draws. And this humility is not merely a technique but a truth, for the other person really is a mystery worthy of attention, often carrying wisdom and goodness of their own, and the believer who approaches them with genuine humility and openness, ready to receive as well as to give, both honors them rightly and evangelizes most effectively. To listen well is to love well and to witness well, and the humility that makes a man a good listener is the same humility that makes him a good evangelist.

There is a practical test a man can apply to himself here. In his conversations about things that matter, is he mostly waiting for his turn to talk, rehearsing his reply while the other person is still speaking, or is he actually taking in what they say, curious about it, changed by it? The first is the posture of the man who has already decided he has nothing to learn and everything to deliver; the second is the posture that draws people. Most believers, if honest, will recognize how much of their listening is really just waiting, and the discipline of genuinely attending, of letting the other person finish, of being willing to be surprised by what they say, is harder and rarer than it sounds. But it is precisely this real attention, so seldom given, that makes a person feel valued and opens them as no technique ever could.

CHAPTER FIVE

Telling Your Story

The Testimony Anyone Can Give

When the time comes to speak, the most natural and powerful thing a man can offer is not an argument or a lecture but his own story, the simple testimony of what Christ has meant in his own life, which anyone can give and which no one can refute. A man does not need to be a theologian or an apologist to share his faith; he needs only to be able to tell, honestly and simply, his own experience of God, and this personal testimony is often the most persuasive thing he has. Learning to tell one's story simply and without pretension is a skill every evangelist should have.

One thing I do know, that though I was blind, now I see. — John 9:25

The Testimony No One Can Argue With

There is a unique power in personal testimony, in a man simply telling what he himself has experienced of God, because while a person may argue with doctrines and dispute proofs, he cannot argue with another man's genuine experience. The man born blind whom Christ healed did not win a theological debate with his interrogators; he simply said, I do not know all the answers to your questions, but one thing I know, that I was blind and now I see, and his simple testimony was unanswerable. So it is with every believer's honest account of what Christ has done in his own life: the peace he has found, the change he has undergone, the meaning and hope he has received. These are facts of the man's own experience that no one can refute, and offered simply and sincerely they carry a weight that argument cannot. A man who has learned to tell his own story of faith has a tool of evangelization available to him in every situation, one that requires no special learning and that reaches people in a way abstract argument never does.

Simple and Honest, Not Polished

The power of personal testimony lies precisely in its simplicity and honesty, not in polish or drama, and a man should tell his story plainly, as it actually is, without exaggeration or performance. There is a temptation to dramatize one's testimony, to make it more spectacular than it was, or to deliver it in the practiced tones of a professional witness, but this undermines the very authenticity that gives testimony its power. The most effective testimony is the honest one, told in a man's own ordinary voice, including its undramatic reality and even its ongoing struggles, for people are drawn to what is real and repelled by what is staged. A man need not have a spectacular conversion story to testify; the quiet, ordinary story of a faith that has steadily given meaning, peace, and hope is often more relatable and more persuasive than a dramatic one. What matters is honesty: that a man tell truly what Christ has actually meant in his life, in his own plain words, trusting that the simple truth of his experience, honestly shared, is more powerful than any polished performance could be.

Pointing Beyond Yourself

The purpose of telling one's own story is finally not to talk about oneself but to point beyond oneself to Christ, and a man must keep this aim clear lest his testimony become mere autobiography. The personal story is a means, a way of making Christ concrete and credible by showing what he has done in an actual life, but the subject is always Christ, not the man telling the story; the testimony succeeds when it draws attention not to the witness but to the One the witness points toward. This keeps testimony humble and keeps it from becoming a performance of the self, for the man knows he is not the point but only a finger pointing to the point. A good testimony, then, tells the man's own story in such a way that the hearer's attention is drawn past the man to the Christ who changed him, leaving them not impressed with the witness but curious about his Lord. The man who tells his story well disappears behind it, becoming transparent to the Christ he is pointing to, so that the hearer comes away thinking not what a remarkable man but what a remarkable Lord, who could do that in a life. This is the aim of all testimony, and the humble, honest story that points beyond itself to Christ is the most powerful word most men will ever speak.

CHAPTER SIX

Reading the Moment

Timing, Restraint, and the Open Door

A great deal of the art of evangelization lies in timing, in the wisdom to know when to speak and when to stay silent, when a door is open and when pushing would only slam it shut. The insufferable evangelist has no such discernment; he presses his message regardless of the moment, oblivious to whether the other person is open or closed. The wise evangelist, by contrast, reads the moment, speaks when the time is right, holds back when it is not, and above all keeps the door open for the future rather than forcing a premature conclusion that ends the conversation for good.

For everything there is a season… a time to keep silence, and a time to speak. — Ecclesiastes 3:1,7

Knowing When to Speak

There are moments when a person is open to speaking of deeper things, when a question has arisen, a crisis has cracked their self-sufficiency, or a longing has surfaced, and the wise evangelist learns to recognize and seize these moments while letting other moments pass. Faith is most often received at particular junctures, when life has raised the questions that faith answers, and a man attuned to the people around him can discern when such a moment has come, when a person is actually ready to hear rather than merely being talked at. These openings cannot be manufactured, but they can be watched for and recognized, and the man who has built a genuine relationship and listened well will usually sense when the door has opened. Seizing these right moments, and not wasting one's words on the wrong ones, is a central skill of evangelization; much depends on speaking when the person is ready to hear, which requires the attentiveness to notice when that readiness has come and the restraint to wait until it does.

The Wisdom of Restraint

Just as important as knowing when to speak is knowing when to stay silent, exercising the restraint that the eager evangelist finds so difficult, for there are many moments when the loving and effective thing is to say nothing. Pressing the faith on a person who is not open, continuing to talk when the other has closed, forcing the subject when the moment is wrong, these do real damage, hardening the person and often ending the possibility of future conversation. The wise evangelist holds back, content to wait, trusting that the relationship and the witness of his life are doing their work even in his silence, and that there will be other moments. This restraint is not a failure of zeal but a higher form of it, a zeal disciplined by wisdom and love, which cares more about the person's eventual coming to faith than about the satisfaction of having said one's piece. The man who cannot stop himself from pushing, who must always be making his point, usually does more harm than good; the man who has learned the wisdom of restraint, who can love someone in silence and wait for the right moment, is far more likely to see them come, in time, to faith.

Keep the Door Open

Above all, the wise evangelist aims always to keep the door open, to leave every interaction in such a way that the conversation can continue another day, rather than forcing a premature conclusion that closes it for good. The goal is almost never to resolve everything in a single conversation, which usually only hardens the other person, but to leave them with the sense that the believer is reasonable, kind, and worth talking to again, so that the relationship and the conversation can continue. This means not needing to win, not having the last word, being content to plant a seed and leave it, declining to push the person to a conclusion they are not ready for. A man who keeps the door open may say very little in any given conversation, but he ensures that there will be more conversations, and it is usually across many conversations over time, not in a single decisive encounter, that a person comes to faith. The insufferable evangelist slams doors by forcing the issue; the wise one keeps them open by his patience and restraint, and the open door is worth more than any argument won, for it leaves room for grace to work in its own time.

CHAPTER SEVEN

Leave the Results to God

The Freedom of the Faithful Sower

We come finally to the truth that frees a man from the anxiety that makes evangelization grasping and obnoxious: that the results are not finally his to produce, that he is called to be faithful in sowing and witnessing, but that the increase belongs to God alone. The insufferable evangelist is often driven by a felt responsibility to produce conversions, a pressure that makes him push; the free and effective evangelist has handed the results to God and is liberated simply to love, witness, and sow, trusting the harvest to the One who alone can give it.

I planted, Apollos watered, but God gave the growth. — 1 Corinthians 3:6

You Cannot Convert Anyone

A liberating truth stands at the foundation of all healthy evangelization: no man can actually convert another, for conversion is the work of God's grace in a human heart, and the evangelist is only an instrument, never the cause. A man can sow, can witness, can water, can love, but he cannot produce the inner change that is conversion, which is a gift of God given in God's own time and way. This truth removes from a man's shoulders a weight that was never his to carry, the impossible burden of producing results that are not finally in his power, and it frees him from the anxious pushing that comes from feeling responsible for outcomes he cannot control. The evangelist who understands that he cannot convert anyone is freed to do what he actually can do, which is to be faithful, to love, witness, and sow, and to leave to God the one thing only God can do. This is not an excuse for laziness but a liberation from false pressure, and the man who grasps it evangelizes with a freedom and a peace that the man still trying to produce conversions by his own effort never knows.

Faithful in Sowing

Released from responsibility for the harvest, a man is free to concentrate on what is actually his part, which is faithfulness in sowing, the patient, persistent scattering of seed whose fruit he may never see. The image Scripture gives is of a division of labor in which one plants, another waters, and God gives the growth, so that each servant is responsible only for his own faithful part and not for the increase, which is God's alone. This frees a man from needing to see results, from measuring his evangelization by conversions produced, and lets him simply be faithful in his sowing, trusting that the seed he scatters is doing work he cannot see and may contribute to a harvest reaped by others long after. Much evangelization is sowing that someone else will reap; a man plants a seed in a conversation, lives a witness over years, and the person comes to faith much later through someone else entirely, the final fruit drawing on seeds this man sowed and forgot. The faithful sower does not need to see the harvest to know his sowing matters, and he is content to do his part well and leave the rest to God and to time.

The Freedom This Gives

The whole effect of leaving the results to God is a profound freedom, the freedom that transforms a man from an anxious, pushing evangelist into a peaceful, loving, and therefore far more effective one. When a man no longer carries the burden of producing conversions, when he has genuinely handed the results to God, he is freed from the very anxiety that made his evangelization grasping and obnoxious, and can simply love people, witness naturally, speak when the moment is right, and leave the rest in God's hands. This freedom is itself attractive; people sense the difference between the believer who is working them toward a conversion he needs to produce and the believer who simply loves them and shares his faith with no anxious agenda, and they are drawn to the latter. Paradoxically, then, the man who lets go of the results, who stops trying to produce conversions and simply sows faithfully in freedom and love, becomes a far more effective evangelist than the one still straining to close the sale. The freedom of the faithful sower, who does his part and trusts God with the rest, is both the happiest way to evangelize and the most fruitful, and it is the final secret of evangelizing well without being insufferable.

CONCLUSION

Good News, Shared Well

Evangelization, rightly understood, is nothing like the caricature that makes men cringe. It is not a sales pitch, not the winning of arguments, not the judging of others, but the sharing of good news by a man whose life has been changed by it, carried on the attractiveness of that life, through relationships of genuine love, in the humility of real listening, by the simple telling of one's own story, with the wisdom to read the moment, and in the freedom of one who leaves the results to God. There is nothing insufferable in any of this; done well, it makes a man not less worth being around but more.

The whole of it comes down to a few convictions that free a man both to evangelize and to do it well: that who he is matters more than what he says; that he must love people really, not as projects; that he should listen far more than he speaks; that his own honest story is his most powerful word; that timing and restraint matter as much as zeal; and that the results belong to God, not to him. A man who has absorbed these can share his faith naturally and winsomely in the ordinary course of his life, without ever becoming the obnoxious caricature he rightly feared, and with far more effect than the caricature ever has.

So do not let the fear of being insufferable keep you from sharing the best thing you have. Become a man whose life raises the question; love the people around you really and patiently; listen to them before you speak; tell your own story simply and honestly when the moment comes; keep the door open always; and leave the harvest to God. Do this, and you will evangelize not by becoming someone you would despise but by becoming more fully the man grace is making you, and the good news you have found will spread through you to others, not pushed but attracting, not argued but shown, drawing people gently toward the Christ who has drawn you. That is evangelization as it was always meant to be, good news shared well, and it is within the reach of any man willing to love.

✦ ✦ ✦

Evangelization Without Being Insufferable is part of The Daily Bread Library.

The Everyday Apostle · everydayapostle.com