THE DAILY BREAD

The Mission of the Apostles

Answering Hard Questions with Grace

A FORMATION BOOK BY

Kendall Peterson

The Everyday Apostle

THE DAILY BREAD

The Mission of the Apostles

Answering Hard Questions

With Grace

✦ ✦ ✦

A Daily Bread Formation Book

The Everyday Apostle

INTRODUCTION

The Question You Did Not See Coming

It happens without warning. At a family dinner, a relative challenges the Church over something in the news. At work, a coworker asks how an intelligent person can still believe in God. A friend, over drinks, demands to know how a good God could allow a child to suffer. A teenager asks why the Church teaches what it does about some hard subject. And in that moment a man's faith is put on the spot, publicly and unexpectedly, and how he responds, not merely what he says but how he says it, will either open a door or slam one shut. Many Christians dread these moments, freeze in them, and come away shaken, and so they learn to avoid the subject of faith entirely.

This book is about handling those moments well, about answering the hard questions people actually ask, with grace. It is not primarily about the content of the answers, the arguments and evidence, which are treated elsewhere, but about the practical art of responding, the disposition and skill that let a man field a hard or hostile question without losing his peace, his charity, or the relationship. For in these charged moments, how a man answers matters at least as much as what he answers, and a true answer delivered with arrogance or anxiety does more harm than good, while even an incomplete answer offered with genuine grace can open a heart. The aim is to equip a man to meet the hard questions, expected and unexpected, with a grace that draws rather than repels.

To make an apt answer is a joy to a man, and a word in season, how good it is! — Proverbs 15:23

We will begin with the inner disposition, the calm that must underlie any gracious answer. We will take up the skill of hearing the real question beneath the question asked. We will consider how to handle the loaded or bad-faith question that is not really seeking an answer. We will address the crucial matter of what to do when one does not know the answer. We will take up keeping grace under attack, when a question comes with hostility. We will learn to handle the question that comes from genuine pain. And we will see that the gracious answer is finally God's work through us, freeing us from the pressure to perform.

CHAPTER ONE

Keep Your Peace

The Calm Beneath a Gracious Answer

Before a man can answer a hard question with grace, he must answer it with peace, for the calm beneath his words is the foundation of their grace, and the man who loses his peace when challenged will lose his grace with it. The most common failure in answering hard questions is not ignorance of the answer but the loss of inner composure, the flash of defensiveness, anxiety, or anger that turns a potential conversation into a confrontation. Learning to keep one's peace when challenged, the calm that underlies every gracious answer, is therefore the first and most fundamental skill.

Whoever is slow to anger has great understanding, but he who has a hasty temper exalts folly. — Proverbs 14:29

The Challenge That Triggers Us

A hard question, especially a hostile one, tends to trigger a reaction in a man, a flash of defensiveness, anxiety, or anger that threatens his composure and, with it, his grace, and the first step to answering well is to recognize this trigger and master it. When a man's faith is challenged, something in him tends to react, to feel attacked, to grow defensive, anxious, or angry, and this reaction, if it governs him, destroys the grace of his answer, turning a conversation into a defense or a fight. The man who would answer with grace must first recognize this triggering, the inner reaction that a challenge provokes, and learn to master it rather than being governed by it, for the answer given from a triggered, reactive state will carry the defensiveness or anger of that state whatever its words. Recognizing that a hard question triggers a reaction, and that this reaction threatens the grace of one's answer, is the necessary first step to keeping one's peace. The challenge that triggers us, the inner reaction of defensiveness, anxiety, or anger that a hard question provokes, threatens the grace of a man's answer, and the first step to answering well is to recognize this triggering and to master it rather than being governed by the reaction that would destroy the grace of one's response.

Pause Before You Answer

The practical key to keeping one's peace is to pause before answering, to take a brief moment before responding to a hard question, which allows the initial reaction to settle and a composed, gracious answer to form in its place. The instinct when challenged is to respond immediately, but the immediate response is usually the reactive one, carrying the defensiveness or anxiety of the triggered state, while a brief pause allows the reaction to settle, the composure to return, and a thoughtful, gracious answer to form. This pause need be only a moment, a breath, a beat of silence, perhaps a brief prayer, but it makes the difference between a reactive answer and a composed one, between words governed by the trigger and words governed by grace. The man who learns to pause before answering a hard question gives himself the space to master his reaction and respond with grace rather than from the trigger, and this simple practice is among the most valuable in the whole art of answering well. Pause before you answer, taking a brief moment before responding to a hard question, and a man gives the initial reaction time to settle and a composed, gracious answer time to form, making the difference between a reactive response governed by the trigger and a gracious one governed by peace.

Peace Comes From Security

The deepest source of the peace that underlies a gracious answer is a man's security in his faith and in God, for the man who is secure, who does not feel his faith threatened by a hard question, can remain calm where the insecure man panics. Much of the defensiveness and anxiety that a hard question provokes comes from insecurity, from a man's feeling that his faith is threatened, that he must defend it or it will fall, and this insecurity breeds the reactive panic that destroys grace. The man secure in his faith and in God, by contrast, does not feel threatened by a hard question, knowing that the truth of his faith does not depend on his winning this exchange, and this security frees him to remain calm, to answer from peace rather than panic. This deep security, rooted in a man's confidence in God and in the truth of his faith, is the ultimate source of the peace that underlies gracious answers, and the man who cultivates it finds that he can meet hard questions with a calm that the insecure cannot. Peace comes from security, from a man's confidence in his faith and in God that frees him from feeling threatened by a hard question, and the man secure in the truth of his faith can answer from calm rather than panic, for he knows that the truth does not depend on his winning the exchange and so is not threatened by the challenge.

CHAPTER TWO

Hear the Real Question

What Is Actually Being Asked

A hard question is often not what it appears on the surface, and a central skill in answering well is hearing the real question beneath the one asked, discerning what the person is actually seeking so that one can answer the true question rather than merely the surface one. The person who asks a hard question frequently has a deeper question, concern, or wound beneath it, and the man who answers only the surface question while missing the real one fails to reach the person. Learning to hear the real question, to discern what is actually being asked, is essential to answering in a way that actually helps.

The heart of the righteous ponders how to answer, but the mouth of the wicked pours out evil things. — Proverbs 15:28

The Question Behind the Question

Behind many a hard question lies a deeper question, a real concern, doubt, or longing that the surface question only partly expresses, and the skilled responder learns to discern and address this question behind the question. When a person asks how a good God could allow suffering, the real question is often not a philosophical one but a personal one, born of their own suffering or that of someone they love; when a person challenges a Church teaching, the real question is often a personal struggle with that very issue. The surface question is frequently a window onto a deeper concern, and the man who hears only the surface question, answering it philosophically while missing the personal struggle beneath, fails to reach the real person. The skilled responder therefore listens for the question behind the question, the real concern, doubt, or wound that the surface question expresses, and seeks to address that deeper question rather than merely the surface one. The question behind the question, the deeper concern or wound beneath the surface challenge, is often the real question a person is asking, and the skilled responder learns to discern and address it rather than answering only the surface question and missing the personal struggle beneath, which is where the person actually is.

Ask Before You Answer

A practical way to reach the real question is to ask before answering, to respond to a hard question with a gentle question of one's own that draws out what the person really means and where they are coming from. Rather than immediately answering a hard question, the skilled responder often asks a clarifying question first, inviting the person to say more about what they mean, why they ask, what is behind the question, which both reveals the real question and shows the person that one is genuinely interested rather than merely defensive. This asking before answering accomplishes several things at once: it buys time to compose a gracious answer, it reveals the real question beneath the surface one, and it transforms the exchange from a confrontation into a conversation, signaling genuine interest in the person rather than mere defense of a position. The man who learns to ask a gentle question before launching into an answer reaches the real question and turns a challenge into a conversation. Ask before you answer, responding to a hard question with a gentle clarifying question that draws out what the person really means, and a man reaches the real question beneath the surface one, buys time to compose a gracious response, and transforms the exchange from a confrontation into a conversation, showing genuine interest in the person rather than mere defensiveness.

Answer the Person, Not Just the Question

The aim of hearing the real question is to answer the person, not merely the question, to respond to the actual human being with their real concerns rather than delivering a generic answer to an abstract question. Every hard question is asked by a particular person with their own history, concerns, and situation, and the gracious answer is tailored to the actual person, addressing their real question and meeting them where they are, rather than being a generic, one-size-fits-all response to the abstract question. The man who answers the person, who has heard the real question and responds to the actual human being before him, reaches the person in a way that the generic answer never does, for his response fits the real question and the real person rather than an abstraction. This answering of the person rather than merely the question is the fruit of hearing the real question, and it is what makes an answer actually helpful to the particular person asking. Answer the person, not just the question, responding to the actual human being with their real concerns rather than delivering a generic answer to an abstract question, and a man reaches the person in a way the generic response never can, for the answer that fits the real question and the real person is the one that actually helps the particular human being asking.

CHAPTER THREE

The Question That Is Not Seeking an Answer

Handling Hostility and Bad Faith

Not every hard question is a sincere inquiry; some are hostile challenges, rhetorical attacks, or bad-faith provocations that are not really seeking an answer at all, and handling these requires a particular wisdom, for the sincere answer wasted on a bad-faith question accomplishes nothing. The man who treats every hard question as a sincere inquiry will be drawn into pointless arguments by those who merely want to attack, while the man who discerns the bad-faith question can respond to it wisely. Understanding how to handle the hostile or bad-faith question, which is not really seeking an answer, equips a man to respond wisely to those who challenge without sincerity.

Answer not a fool according to his folly, lest you be like him yourself. — Proverbs 26:4

Discerning Sincerity

The first skill is to discern whether a question is sincere, whether the person genuinely seeks an answer or is merely attacking, posturing, or provoking, for the two call for very different responses. Some hard questions are sincere inquiries, asked by people who genuinely want to understand, while others are hostile challenges, rhetorical weapons, or bad-faith provocations asked not to learn but to attack, embarrass, or score points, and the skilled responder learns to tell the difference. This discernment is not always easy, but it can usually be sensed from the person's manner, their openness or hostility, their genuine curiosity or their mere desire to attack, and it is crucial, for the sincere question deserves a thoughtful answer while the bad-faith question calls for a different response. The man who discerns the sincerity of a question knows whether he is in a conversation or a combat, and can respond accordingly, rather than wasting sincere answers on those who merely want to fight. Discerning sincerity, telling whether a question genuinely seeks an answer or merely attacks, is the first skill in handling hard questions, for the sincere inquiry and the bad-faith provocation call for very different responses, and the man who can tell the difference knows whether he is in a conversation or a combat and can respond wisely.

Not Taking the Bait

With a bad-faith or hostile question, the wise response is often not to take the bait, not to be drawn into the argument the provoker wants, but to decline the combat gracefully, refusing to be pulled into a fight that cannot be won and serves no purpose. The bad-faith questioner wants to provoke a reaction, to draw the believer into a heated argument, to score points, and the worst response is to take the bait, to be drawn into the combat, to grow defensive or angry, which gives the provoker exactly what he wants and accomplishes nothing good. The wiser response is to decline the bait gracefully, to refuse to be drawn into the fight, perhaps by giving a brief, calm, non-combative response and moving on, by declining to argue, by refusing to supply the reaction sought, which both preserves the believer's grace and denies the provoker his aim. This not taking the bait, this graceful refusal to be drawn into a bad-faith combat, is often the wisest response to a hostile question, for the fight the provoker wants cannot be won and is better declined. Not taking the bait, declining gracefully to be drawn into the combat a bad-faith questioner wants, is often the wisest response to a hostile question, for the believer who refuses to supply the reaction sought and declines the pointless fight both preserves his own grace and denies the provoker his aim, which a heated argument would only serve.

Grace Even Toward the Hostile

Even toward the hostile and the bad-faith questioner, the believer maintains grace, refusing to answer hostility with hostility or bad faith with contempt, for the gracious response to even an unfair attack is both right and often disarming. It is tempting to answer a hostile question with hostility, to meet an unfair attack with a sharp counterattack, to treat the bad-faith questioner with the contempt he seems to deserve, but this surrenders the believer's grace and confirms the worst suspicions about believers. The gracious response, maintaining calm and kindness even toward the hostile, refusing to return hostility for hostility, is both the right response, for the believer is called to grace even toward enemies, and often a disarming one, for the hostile questioner expecting a fight is disarmed by unexpected grace. The believer therefore maintains his grace even toward the hostile and bad-faith questioner, declining to be dragged down to hostility, which both keeps his integrity and often accomplishes more than any argument. Grace even toward the hostile, refusing to answer hostility with hostility or bad faith with contempt, is both the believer's calling and often disarming, for the gracious response to an unfair attack keeps the believer's integrity and frequently accomplishes more than a sharp counterattack, disarming the hostile questioner who expected a fight.

CHAPTER FOUR

When You Do Not Know

The Honesty That Strengthens You

Every believer will face questions he cannot answer, and how he handles these moments of not knowing is crucial, for the honest admission of ignorance strengthens a man's credibility while the bluff destroys it. The fear of being unable to answer keeps many believers from engaging at all, but the inability to answer every question is universal and need not be feared, for it can be handled with an honesty that serves the believer better than any bluff. Understanding how to handle the questions one cannot answer, with the honesty that strengthens rather than weakens, frees a man from the fear of being stumped and equips him to respond well when he does not know.

If any of you lacks wisdom, let him ask God, who gives generously to all without reproach. — James 1:5

Just Say You Don't Know

The simplest and best response to a question one cannot answer is honestly to say so, to admit plainly that one does not know, which both tells the truth and preserves a credibility that bluffing would destroy. The temptation when stumped is to bluff, to pretend to an answer one does not have, to cover one's ignorance with confident-sounding words, but this is both dishonest and transparent, for the bluff is usually seen through and destroys the believer's credibility when it is. Far better is the honest admission, the plain acknowledgment that one does not know the answer to that particular question, which tells the truth, preserves credibility, and is in fact disarming, for the honest I don't know is unexpected and refreshing. This simple honesty, the willingness to admit one does not know, is the best response to a question one cannot answer, and it frees a man from the impossible burden of having an answer for everything. Just say you don't know, admitting plainly when you cannot answer a question, and a man both tells the truth and preserves the credibility that bluffing would destroy, for the honest admission of ignorance is disarming and refreshing where the transparent bluff destroys trust, and it frees a man from the impossible burden of having an answer for everything.

Offer to Find Out

The admission that one does not know can be paired with an offer to find out, a willingness to look into the question and return with an answer, which turns a moment of ignorance into an opportunity for continued engagement. Rather than simply ending at I don't know, the believer can offer to find out, to look into the question, to seek the answer and come back to the person with it, which both demonstrates sincerity and creates an opportunity for a continued conversation. This offer to find out shows that the believer takes the question seriously and is genuinely seeking truth rather than merely defending a position, and it opens the door to a further exchange, a reason to talk again, a continued relationship around the question. The man who admits he does not know and offers to find out turns a moment of apparent weakness into an opportunity for deeper engagement, showing his sincerity and keeping the conversation alive. Offer to find out, pairing the admission that you don't know with a willingness to look into the question and return with an answer, and a man turns a moment of ignorance into an opportunity for continued engagement, demonstrating his sincerity in seeking truth and creating a reason for a further conversation that keeps the relationship and the inquiry alive.

You Don't Have to Have All the Answers

The deepest freedom in handling hard questions is the recognition that one does not have to have all the answers, that no believer can answer every question, and that one's faith does not depend on being able to, which frees a man to engage without the fear of being stumped. Many believers avoid engaging with hard questions out of fear of being unable to answer, but this fear rests on the false assumption that a believer must have all the answers, when in fact no one does, and the faith does not depend on any individual's ability to answer every objection. The believer is freed by the recognition that he need not have all the answers, that being stumped by a hard question is normal and no disgrace, and that his faith stands on far more than his ability to win every argument. This freedom from the need to have all the answers releases a man to engage with hard questions without fear, to admit what he does not know without shame, and to be the honest seeker rather than the anxious defender. You don't have to have all the answers, for no believer can answer every question and the faith does not depend on it, and this recognition frees a man from the fear of being stumped, releasing him to engage with hard questions honestly, to admit what he does not know without shame, and to be an honest seeker rather than an anxious defender who must win every exchange.

CHAPTER FIVE

Grace Under Fire

Staying Kind When It Gets Heated

Hard questions sometimes come wrapped in hostility, delivered with heat, contempt, or aggression, and maintaining grace under this fire, staying kind when the exchange grows heated, is among the hardest and most important skills in answering hard questions. The natural response to hostility is hostility, to meet heat with heat, but this destroys the believer's witness, while the maintenance of grace under fire is both a powerful witness and often the very thing that defuses the hostility. Understanding how to stay kind when it gets heated, to maintain grace under fire, equips a man to keep his witness intact even when challenged with aggression.

To speak evil of no one, to avoid quarreling, to be gentle, and to show perfect courtesy toward all people. — Titus 3:2

Do Not Match Their Heat

The fundamental discipline of grace under fire is refusing to match the other person's heat, declining to meet hostility with hostility or aggression with aggression, but responding to heat with calm, which both preserves the believer's grace and often defuses the conflict. When a question comes with hostility, the natural pull is to match it, to answer heat with heat, aggression with aggression, sharpness with sharpness, but this escalates the conflict and destroys the believer's witness, confirming the worst suspicions about believers. The disciplined response is to refuse to match the heat, to answer hostility with calm, aggression with gentleness, maintaining one's own composure regardless of the other person's temperature, which both keeps the believer's grace and often defuses the hostility, for heat not matched tends to cool. This refusal to match the other person's heat, this maintenance of calm against hostility, is the fundamental discipline of grace under fire, and the believer who masters it keeps his witness intact even when attacked. Do not match their heat, refusing to meet hostility with hostility but answering heat with calm and aggression with gentleness, and a man preserves his grace under fire and often defuses the conflict, for the heat that is not matched tends to cool, while the believer who matches it escalates the conflict and destroys his witness.

Separate the Person From the Attack

A help in maintaining grace under fire is to separate the person from their attack, to see past the hostility to the human being beneath it, who may be acting from their own pain, fear, or past wounds rather than from genuine malice. The hostile questioner is a person, often acting from their own hurt, fear, or bad experience rather than from pure malice, and the believer who can see past the attack to the wounded or fearful person beneath it finds it easier to respond with grace, for he is responding to a hurting human being rather than merely to an attack. This separating of the person from the attack, this seeing of the human being beneath the hostility, both softens the believer's own reaction, making grace easier, and leads him to respond to the real person rather than merely defending against the attack. The believer who learns to see the person beneath the hostility, often wounded or afraid, can maintain grace toward even an aggressive questioner, responding to the human being rather than the attack. Separate the person from the attack, seeing past the hostility to the human being beneath it who may act from their own pain or fear, and a man finds grace easier to maintain under fire, for responding to a wounded person rather than merely to an attack both softens his own reaction and leads him to reach the real human being beneath the hostility.

Grace Is the Real Witness

Finally, the believer maintains grace under fire because the grace itself is the real witness, more powerful than any argument, for the person who attacks the faith and is met with unexpected grace encounters something that no argument could show them. When a person attacks the faith expecting a fight and is met instead with calm, kindness, and grace, they encounter a witness more powerful than any argument, a living demonstration of something the faith produces that they did not expect and cannot easily dismiss. The grace maintained under fire is thus not merely a way of keeping the conversation civil but itself the deepest witness, showing the reality of the faith through the believer's unexpected response more convincingly than any answer to the question could. This means that maintaining grace under fire is not a distraction from the witness but its very heart, for the gracious response to hostility preaches more powerfully than words, and the believer's grace is often what the hostile questioner remembers long after the argument is forgotten. Grace is the real witness, more powerful than any argument, for the person who attacks the faith and is met with unexpected grace encounters a living demonstration of what the faith produces, and the believer who maintains grace under fire gives a witness that preaches more convincingly than any answer, often remembered long after the argument is forgotten.

CHAPTER SIX

When the Question Comes From Pain

Answering the Wounded Heart

Some hard questions come not from the intellect but from the heart, from genuine pain, and these require not primarily an argument but a compassionate response that addresses the wound beneath the question. The person who asks how a good God could allow their child to die is not usually seeking a philosophical answer but expressing a grief, and the believer who answers such a question with an argument, however sound, misses the person entirely. Understanding how to answer the question that comes from pain, to respond to the wounded heart rather than merely the intellectual question, equips a man to meet the deepest and most delicate hard questions with the compassion they require.

Rejoice with those who rejoice, weep with those who weep. — Romans 12:15

Recognize the Pain

The first thing in answering a question born of pain is to recognize that it is born of pain, to perceive that the question is the expression of a wound rather than a request for an argument, so that one responds to the pain rather than treating the question as merely intellectual. Many hard questions, especially those about suffering, evil, and the hard providences of God, come from a place of real pain, expressing a grief, a wound, a struggle, rather than seeking a philosophical answer, and the believer must recognize this, perceiving the pain beneath the question rather than treating it as a merely intellectual puzzle. The failure to recognize the pain, the treating of a grief-born question as an abstract philosophical challenge to be answered with arguments, misses the person entirely and can wound them further, while the recognition of the pain opens the way to a compassionate response. This recognizing of the pain beneath a question, the perceiving that it expresses a wound rather than seeks an argument, is the necessary first step to answering the wounded heart. Recognize the pain, perceiving that a question is born of a wound rather than a request for an argument, and a man responds to the real person rather than treating a grief-born question as an abstract puzzle, for the failure to recognize the pain misses the person and can wound them further, while its recognition opens the way to the compassion the wounded heart requires.

Compassion Before Answers

When a question comes from pain, compassion must come before answers, for the wounded heart needs first to be met with understanding and presence rather than with arguments, however true. The person asking a question from pain needs, above all, to be heard, understood, and accompanied in their suffering, and the believer's first response should be compassion, the acknowledgment of their pain, the weeping with those who weep, the presence that accompanies, rather than an immediate argument that, however sound, feels cold and dismissive to a wounded heart. There may be a place for an answer later, but it must come after compassion, after the person has been met in their pain, for the answer offered before compassion feels like a dismissal of the suffering, while the answer offered after compassion, if it comes at all, is received in the context of genuine care. The believer who leads with compassion rather than answers, meeting the wounded heart with understanding and presence before any argument, responds rightly to the question born of pain. Compassion before answers, meeting the wounded heart with understanding and presence before offering any argument, is the right response to a question born of pain, for the person needs first to be heard and accompanied in their suffering, and the answer offered before compassion feels like a dismissal while the answer offered after, if at all, is received in the context of genuine care.

Sometimes Presence Is the Answer

Sometimes the best answer to a question from pain is not words at all but presence, the faithful accompaniment of the suffering person, for some pain has no verbal answer that helps, and the believer's loving presence speaks more than any argument. There are questions born of pain so deep that no verbal answer helps, where the attempt to explain or justify the suffering only wounds further, and in these cases the best response is not an answer but presence, the believer's faithful accompaniment of the suffering person, his willingness to be with them in their pain without trying to explain it away. This presence, this being-with in suffering, often speaks more powerfully than any words, communicating a love and a solidarity that no argument could, and it is sometimes the only adequate response to the deepest pain. The believer must therefore know when to stop seeking an answer and simply to be present, to accompany the suffering person in their pain rather than trying to resolve it with words, for sometimes presence is the answer that the wounded heart most needs. Sometimes presence is the answer, the faithful accompaniment of a suffering person rather than any verbal response, for some pain has no verbal answer that helps, and the believer's loving presence speaks more than any argument could, communicating a love and solidarity that meets the wounded heart more deeply than words, so that the believer must know when to stop seeking an answer and simply to be present.

CHAPTER SEVEN

Let the Spirit Give You the Words

The Grace Beyond Your Preparation

For all a man can learn and prepare, the gracious answer to a hard question is finally a gift of the Holy Spirit, who gives the right words in the moment, so that the believer's deepest resource is not his own preparation but his reliance on the Spirit. Jesus promised his followers that the Holy Spirit would teach them what to say when they were called to answer, and this promise frees the believer from the pressure of having to produce the perfect answer by his own resources. Understanding that the gracious answer is finally the Spirit's gift, and relying on him, both frees a man and gives him a resource beyond his own preparation.

For the Holy Spirit will teach you in that very hour what you ought to say. — Luke 12:12

You Are Not Alone in the Moment

The first comfort is that a man is not alone when he faces a hard question, for the Holy Spirit is with him, ready to give him the words he needs, so that he faces the challenge not merely with his own resources but with the help of God. When a believer is put on the spot by a hard question, he may feel alone, dependent entirely on his own knowledge and quickness, but this is not the truth, for the Holy Spirit is with him, promised by Christ to teach him what to say, so that he faces the moment with divine help and not merely his own resources. This presence of the Spirit in the moment of challenge is a great comfort, freeing the believer from the terror of being alone and inadequate, and assuring him that he can rely on the Spirit's help for the words he needs. The believer who remembers that he is not alone in the moment, that the Spirit is with him to give him words, faces hard questions with a confidence that his own resources alone could not give. You are not alone in the moment, for the Holy Spirit is with you when you face a hard question, ready to give you the words you need, and this presence of the Spirit frees the believer from the terror of facing the challenge alone and inadequate, assuring him that he can rely on divine help and not merely his own resources for the words the moment requires.

Pray in the Moment

The practical way to rely on the Spirit is to pray in the moment, to breathe a quick silent prayer for help when a hard question comes, asking the Spirit for the right words and the right spirit, drawing on his help exactly when it is needed. The believer need not rely on his own resources alone when facing a hard question, but can pray in the very moment, silently asking the Holy Spirit for help, for the right words, for the grace to answer well, drawing on divine assistance exactly when the challenge comes. This praying in the moment, this quick silent turning to the Spirit for help when a hard question arises, both invokes the Spirit's promised assistance and keeps the believer dependent on God rather than on his own quickness, opening him to the help that is promised. The believer who learns to pray in the moment, to turn silently to the Spirit for help when challenged, draws on a resource beyond his own preparation and faces hard questions with divine assistance. Pray in the moment, breathing a quick silent prayer for the Spirit's help when a hard question comes, and a man draws on divine assistance exactly when it is needed, invoking the Spirit's promised help for the right words and the right spirit, and keeping himself dependent on God rather than on his own quickness, opening himself to the help that Christ has promised.

Freed From the Pressure to Perform

Finally, the recognition that the answer is the Spirit's gift frees the believer from the pressure to perform, from the anxiety of having to produce the perfect answer by his own brilliance, leaving him to rely on the Spirit and to be at peace. Much of the anxiety that surrounds hard questions comes from the felt pressure to perform, to produce a brilliant and conclusive answer by one's own resources, and this pressure both breeds anxiety and makes the believer's answers worse, for the anxious performer answers poorly. The recognition that the answer is finally the Spirit's gift, that the believer's part is to be a faithful and available instrument rather than a brilliant performer, frees him from this pressure, allowing him to relax, to rely on the Spirit, to do his honest best and trust God with the rest. This freedom from the pressure to perform both relieves the believer's anxiety and improves his answers, for the man at peace, relying on the Spirit, answers better than the anxious performer straining to produce brilliance by his own power. Freed from the pressure to perform, relying on the Spirit's gift rather than his own brilliance, the believer is released from the anxiety of having to produce the perfect answer by his own resources, allowing him to be at peace, to do his honest best, and to trust God with the rest, which both relieves his anxiety and improves his answers, for the man at peace answers better than the anxious performer.

CONCLUSION

Ready, and at Peace

Hard questions come unbidden, and this book has been about meeting them with grace. We have seen that a gracious answer rests on inner peace, the calm that must underlie the words; that the skill of hearing the real question lets us answer the person rather than merely the surface question; that the hostile or bad-faith question calls for discernment and the refusal to take the bait; that the questions we cannot answer are handled by an honesty that strengthens rather than weakens; that grace under fire is itself the deepest witness; that the question from pain requires compassion before answers; and that the gracious answer is finally the Spirit's gift, freeing us from the pressure to perform.

Through all of it runs a single theme: that in answering hard questions, how we answer matters as much as what we answer, and that the grace of our response, the peace, the kindness, the honesty, the compassion, often reaches people more powerfully than any argument. The believer who has learned to answer hard questions with grace need no longer dread the moments when his faith is put on the spot, for he knows how to meet them in a way that opens doors rather than closing them.

So be ready, and be at peace. Keep your peace beneath every answer; hear the real question beneath the one asked; handle hostility with discernment and grace; admit honestly what you do not know; stay kind when it gets heated, knowing that your grace is the real witness; meet the question from pain with compassion before answers; and rely on the Spirit to give you the words, freed from the pressure to perform. Do this, and the hard questions that once filled you with dread will become occasions of grace, moments when your gracious response witnesses to the faith more powerfully than any argument could, and you will meet them not with anxiety but ready, and at peace.

✦ ✦ ✦

Answering Hard Questions with Grace is part of The Daily Bread Library.