THE DAILY BREAD

The Magnificat of the Beloved

The Interior Landscape

Sin and Conscience

A FORMATION BOOK BY

Kendall Peterson

The Everyday Apostle

THE DAILY BREAD

Magnificat of the Beloved

The Interior Landscape

Sin, Conscience, and the Moral Life

✦ ✦ ✦

A Daily Bread Formation Book

The Everyday Apostle

INTRODUCTION

Knowing the Ground You Walk

The moral life is lived on an interior landscape, the terrain of a woman's own heart, with its heights and depths, its clear places and its shadowed corners, and to live it well she must know that ground. Yet many women navigate their interior life without a map, unsure what sin actually is, unclear on the difference between a serious sin and a small one, unaware of the particular ways disorder works in a woman's heart, and so their efforts at the moral life, and their experience of Confession, remain vague and often fruitless. To grow in holiness, a woman needs to know the ground she walks, to understand sin honestly, without either minimizing it or being crushed by shame.

This book maps that interior landscape. It will show how to approach the map honestly and without shame; what sin actually is, a thought, word, deed, or omission against God's love; what mortal sin is, in its three conditions, and its grave effect on the soul; what venial sin is, and why it must not be treated casually; the seven capital sins that are the roots of sin; the particular ways these capital sins manifest in a woman's interior life, named with mercy and not condemnation; and what conscience is, the inner guide a woman must form and follow. The aim is not to induce shame or scrupulosity but to give a woman an honest, merciful map of her own interior landscape, so that she can navigate the moral life, and approach Confession, with clear sight.

Search me, O God, and know my heart; see if there be any grievous way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting. — Psalm 139:23-24

The psalmist invites God to search his heart and show him any grievous way in him, a model of the honest self-knowledge a woman needs for the moral life. This book will give her the map: approaching it without shame; understanding what sin is; grasping mortal and venial sin; recognizing the capital sins and how they appear in women; and forming the conscience that guides her. A woman cannot navigate an interior landscape she does not know. This book will help her know it, honestly and without shame, so that she can walk the moral life with clear sight and bring real knowledge of her heart to God.

CHAPTER ONE

Honest, Without Shame

How to Look at Your Own Sin

Before mapping the interior landscape, a woman must learn how to look at her own sin, honestly and clearly yet without shame or scrupulosity, for the right disposition makes self-knowledge a path to healing rather than to despair. Understanding how to approach her own sin, with honesty and without shame, frees a woman to examine her interior landscape truthfully, as an act of mercy toward herself and not condemnation.

There is therefore now no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus. — Romans 8:1

Neither Minimizing Nor Despairing

A woman looks at her sin rightly by avoiding two errors, the minimizing that refuses to take sin seriously and the despairing that is crushed by it, holding instead to an honest and hopeful clarity. There are two wrong ways to regard one's own sin, by minimizing it, refusing to see or take it seriously, excusing and rationalizing, and by despairing over it, being crushed by shame and self-condemnation, and both prevent real growth, so that a woman looks at her sin rightly only by avoiding both, taking her sin seriously and honestly while not being crushed by it, holding clarity and hope together. This means a woman neither excuses her sin nor is destroyed by it, but looks at it with honest clarity and hope, so that her self-knowledge is truthful without being despairing, serious without being crushing, the balanced disposition that allows real growth. The woman who neither minimizes nor despairs looks at her sin with honest clarity and hope, able to grow rather than excuse or be crushed. Neither minimizing nor despairing is how a woman looks at her sin rightly, taking it seriously and honestly while not being crushed by it, so that her self-knowledge is truthful and hopeful rather than excusing or despairing.

Named Without Condemnation

A woman can name her sins honestly because she is not condemned, for there is no condemnation for those in Christ, so that honest self-examination is safe, done in the security of God's mercy rather than under the threat of condemnation. The reason a woman can look honestly at her sin without being crushed is that she is not condemned, for the Scripture declares there is no condemnation for those in Christ, so that she examines her sins within the security of God's mercy, naming them truthfully not as one awaiting condemnation but as a beloved child assured of forgiveness, so that honest self-knowledge is safe and even healing. This means a woman can afford to be honest about her sin precisely because she is not condemned, so that she names her sins freely within the safety of God's mercy, her honest self-examination an act done in security rather than fear, leading to forgiveness rather than condemnation. The woman who names her sins without condemnation examines herself honestly within the safety of God's mercy, freed from the fear of condemnation. Named without condemnation, a woman's sins can be examined honestly because there is no condemnation for those in Christ, so that self-examination is done in the security of God's mercy rather than under threat.

Self-Knowledge as Mercy

Naming one's sins accurately is an act of mercy toward oneself, not condemnation, for honest self-knowledge is the first step toward healing, so that a woman examines her interior landscape as a kindness and not a cruelty. To know one's own sins and disorders accurately is not a cruelty but a mercy, for a woman cannot be healed of what she does not see, cannot bring to God and to Confession what she refuses to acknowledge, so that honest self-knowledge, far from being self-condemnation, is the first act of mercy toward herself, the clear sight that opens the way to healing and forgiveness. This means a woman's honest examination of her interior landscape is an act of self-mercy, a kindness that seeks healing, so that she names her sins not to punish herself but to bring them into the light where they can be forgiven and healed, self-knowledge in the service of mercy. The woman who understands self-knowledge as mercy examines her sins kindly, seeking healing rather than punishing herself. Self-knowledge as mercy means naming one's sins accurately is a kindness and not a cruelty, for a woman cannot be healed of what she does not see, so that honest self-examination is the first act of mercy toward herself.

CHAPTER TWO

What Sin Actually Is

A Turning From Love

To map the interior landscape, a woman must first understand what sin actually is, not merely breaking a rule but a thought, word, deed, or omission against God's law, which is at its heart a turning away from love. Understanding what sin actually is, an offense against God that is a turning from love, gives a woman the true definition on which the whole map of the moral life rests.

> Everyone who makes a practice of sinning also practices lawlessness; sin is lawlessness. — 1 John 3:4

Against God's Law

Sin is a thought, word, deed, or omission against God's law, a failure to conform to the truth and goodness that God's law expresses, so that sin is defined by its opposition to God's will. The traditional definition of sin is a thought, word, deed, or omission against God's law, meaning that sin can be committed not only by actions but by words, by interior thoughts, and by failures to do the good one should, and that in each case sin is a turning against God's law, the expression of His will and of the truth and goodness of how things ought to be, so that sin is defined by its opposition to God's law. This means sin is broader than wrong actions, including sinful thoughts and sinful omissions, and is always a turning against God's law, so that a woman understands sin as any thought, word, deed, or omission that opposes the will and law of God. The woman who understands sin as against God's law sees it in her thoughts and omissions as well as her deeds, always a turning against His will. Against God's law, sin is a thought, word, deed, or omission that opposes His will, so that it is defined not merely as wrong action but as any turning against the law that expresses God's truth and goodness.

A Turning From Love

At its deepest, sin is a turning away from love, from the love of God and neighbor, for God's law is a law of love, so that every sin is at heart a failure or refusal to love. Beneath the definition of sin as against God's law lies its deepest meaning, for God's law is a law of love, summed up in loving God and neighbor, so that every sin is at its heart a turning away from love, a failure to love God above all or to love one's neighbor as oneself, a preference of self or some lesser good over the love that God's law commands, so that sin is fundamentally a disorder of love. This means a woman understands sin most deeply not as the mere breaking of rules but as a turning from love, so that her sins are failures and refusals of love, and the moral life is ultimately about growing in the love that sin opposes. The woman who understands sin as a turning from love sees her sins as failures of love and the moral life as the growth of love. A turning from love is the deepest meaning of sin, for God's law is a law of love, so that every sin is at heart a failure or refusal to love God and neighbor, a disorder of love rather than the mere breaking of rules.

Why Sin Matters

Sin matters because it damages a woman's relationship with God and harms herself and others, wounding the love for which she was made, so that sin is not a trivial matter of rule-keeping but a real harm. Sin is not a trivial concern, a mere technical breaking of rules, for it matters greatly, damaging a woman's relationship with God, wounding her own soul, harming others, and opposing the love for which she and the world were made, so that sin does real harm, to her communion with God, to herself, and to others, a genuine evil and not a mere technicality. This means a woman takes sin seriously because it genuinely matters, really damaging her relationship with God and harming herself and others, so that she understands the moral life as a serious matter of love and harm, not a trivial game of rule-keeping. The woman who understands why sin matters takes it seriously as a real harm to her relationship with God and to herself and others. Why sin matters is that it damages a woman's relationship with God and harms herself and others, wounding the love for which she was made, so that sin is a real evil rather than a trivial matter of rule-keeping.

CHAPTER THREE

Mortal Sin

The Sin That Kills the Life of God

Not all sins are equal, for there is a grave kind of sin, mortal sin, which kills the life of God in the soul, and understanding its three conditions and its effect is essential to the moral life and to Confession. Understanding mortal sin, its three conditions and its grave effect on the soul, gives a woman the clear knowledge she needs to recognize serious sin and the necessity of Confession.

There is sin that leads to death. All wrongdoing is sin, but there is sin that does not lead to death. — 1 John 5:16-17

The Three Conditions

A sin is mortal only when three conditions are all present together, grave matter, full knowledge, and deliberate consent, so that all three are required for a sin to be mortal. The Church teaches that for a sin to be mortal, three conditions must all be met, grave matter, meaning the thing done is seriously wrong, full knowledge, meaning the person knows it is seriously wrong, and deliberate consent, meaning the person freely and deliberately chooses it, so that a mortal sin requires all three together, a seriously wrong act done with full knowledge and free consent. This means a woman can assess whether a sin is mortal by these three conditions, recognizing that all three must be present, so that a seriously wrong act done without full knowledge or without full consent, through ignorance, compulsion, or weakness, may not be a mortal sin, though grave matter remains serious. The woman who understands the three conditions can recognize mortal sin by the presence of grave matter, full knowledge, and deliberate consent together. The three conditions of mortal sin are grave matter, full knowledge, and deliberate consent, all of which must be present together, so that a sin is mortal only when a seriously wrong act is done with full knowledge and free consent.

The Death of Grace in the Soul

Mortal sin is called mortal because it kills the life of God in the soul, destroying sanctifying grace and severing a woman from the divine life, so that its effect is grave and spiritually deadly. The reason mortal sin is so named is its effect, for it kills the supernatural life of God in the soul, driving out sanctifying grace, severing a woman from the divine life and from friendship with God, so that she who commits a mortal sin loses the state of grace and is spiritually dead, cut off from the life of God until it is restored, a grave and deadly effect on the soul. This means mortal sin is spiritually fatal, destroying the life of God in a woman's soul, so that it is not a minor matter but a grave spiritual death, a severing from God that she cannot treat lightly and must take with utmost seriousness. The woman who understands the death of grace in the soul sees mortal sin as spiritually fatal, destroying the divine life within her. The death of grace in the soul is the effect of mortal sin, which kills the life of God and destroys sanctifying grace, so that it severs a woman from the divine life and is spiritually deadly.

The Necessity of Confession

Because mortal sin kills the life of God, it requires the sacrament of Confession to be forgiven and the grace restored, for contrition alone, apart from the sacrament, is not the ordinary means of its forgiveness. Since mortal sin destroys sanctifying grace, it must be forgiven and the grace restored, and the ordinary means Christ gave for this is the sacrament of Confession, so that a woman in mortal sin needs to go to Confession to have the sin forgiven and the life of God restored, for contrition alone, however sincere, is not the ordinary appointed means of forgiving mortal sin apart from the sacrament, which Christ established precisely for this. This means a woman who has committed a mortal sin must seek Confession to restore the state of grace, not relying on a vague sense of being sorry but using the sacrament Christ gave, so that the necessity of Confession follows directly from the gravity of mortal sin. The woman who understands the necessity of Confession seeks the sacrament to have mortal sin forgiven and the life of God restored. The necessity of Confession follows from mortal sin's killing of grace, for the sacrament is the ordinary means Christ gave to forgive it and restore the divine life, so that a woman in mortal sin needs Confession and not contrition alone.

CHAPTER FOUR

Venial Sin

The Little Foxes That Spoil

Besides mortal sin there is venial sin, a less serious sin that does not kill the life of God but wounds and weakens it, and though it is not deadly, it must not be treated casually, for its cumulative effect is real. Understanding venial sin, its nature and its cumulative effect, teaches a woman to take seriously even the smaller sins that spoil the vineyard of her soul.

Catch the foxes for us, the little foxes that spoil the vineyards., Song of Solomon 2:15

Not Deadly, but Real

Venial sin does not kill the life of God in the soul as mortal sin does, but it is a real sin that wounds the soul and weakens charity, so that it is less serious but genuinely harmful. Venial sin is a less serious sin, lacking one or more of the conditions of mortal sin, perhaps because the matter is not grave, or the knowledge or consent is incomplete, so that it does not destroy sanctifying grace or sever a woman from God, but it is still a real sin, a true offense against God's love that wounds the soul, weakens charity, and disposes toward worse, so that it is not deadly but genuinely harmful. This means a woman recognizes venial sin as real and harmful even though it is not deadly, so that she does not dismiss it as nothing but takes it seriously as a true if lesser sin that wounds her soul and her love. The woman who understands venial sin as not deadly but real takes it seriously as a true offense that wounds her soul, though it does not kill grace. Not deadly, but real, venial sin does not destroy the life of God as mortal sin does, but it is a true offense that wounds the soul and weakens charity, so that it is less serious yet genuinely harmful.

The Danger of Treating It Casually

Venial sin becomes dangerous when it is treated casually, for the habitual acceptance of small sins weakens the soul, dulls the conscience, and disposes a woman toward graver sin, so that small sins must not be dismissed. The great danger with venial sin is to treat it casually, as though it did not matter, for the habitual toleration of small sins gradually weakens the soul, dulls the conscience to the seriousness of sin, erodes a woman's love, and disposes her toward graver sin over time, so that casually accepted venial sins, like little foxes, slowly spoil the vineyard of the soul. This means a woman must not dismiss venial sins as unimportant, for treating them casually is itself dangerous, gradually corrupting the soul and opening the way to worse, so that she takes even her small sins seriously rather than tolerating them as harmless. The woman who sees the danger of treating venial sin casually takes her small sins seriously, refusing to let them spoil her soul. The danger of treating it casually is that habitual acceptance of small sins weakens the soul, dulls the conscience, and disposes toward graver sin, so that venial sins must not be dismissed but taken seriously.

The Value of Small Faithfulness

Because small things matter, a woman grows in holiness through small faithfulness, attending to the little sins and the small acts of love, for faithfulness in little things prepares faithfulness in much. The Scripture teaches that one faithful in little is faithful in much, revealing the value of small faithfulness, so that a woman grows in holiness not only by avoiding grave sin but by attending to the small things, resisting venial sins, performing small acts of love, being faithful in the little matters of daily life, for this small faithfulness forms her character and prepares her for greater faithfulness. This means a woman's growth in holiness is served by small faithfulness, by taking seriously the little sins and the small goods, so that she attends to the small matters of the moral life, knowing that faithfulness in little things is the path to faithfulness in much. The woman who values small faithfulness attends to the little sins and small goods, growing in holiness through faithfulness in little things. The value of small faithfulness is that attending to the little sins and small acts of love forms a woman's holiness, for faithfulness in little things prepares faithfulness in much.

CHAPTER FIVE

The Roots of Sin

The Seven Capital Sins

Beneath particular sins lie deeper roots, the seven capital sins, pride, greed, lust, anger, gluttony, envy, and sloth, which are not merely bad acts but root disorders from which other sins spring, so that understanding them maps the sources of sin in the heart. Understanding the seven capital sins as the roots from which sin grows gives a woman a map of the deeper disorders of her heart that she must address.

Each person is tempted when he is lured and enticed by his own desire. Then desire when it has conceived gives birth to sin. — James 1:14-15

Root Disorders, Not Just Acts

The seven capital sins are not merely individual bad acts but root disorders of the heart, deep tendencies from which many particular sins spring, so that they are the sources rather than the surface of sin. The seven capital sins, sometimes called the deadly sins, are not primarily a list of bad behaviors but root disorders, deep-seated tendencies of a fallen heart, pride, greed, lust, anger, gluttony, envy, and sloth, from which countless particular sins grow, so that they are called capital, meaning head or source, because they are the roots and sources of other sins rather than merely the sins themselves. This means a woman understands the capital sins as the deep roots of her particular sins, the disordered tendencies beneath the surface from which her actual sins spring, so that addressing them means going to the root rather than merely cutting off the surface acts. The woman who understands root disorders, not just acts, looks beneath her particular sins to the capital sins that are their source. Root disorders, not just acts, is what the seven capital sins are, deep tendencies of the heart from which particular sins spring, so that they are the sources of sin rather than merely its surface.

How Sin Grows From Desire

Sin grows from disordered desire, for the capital sins are disordered desires that, when indulged, conceive and give birth to sinful acts, so that the roots in the heart produce the fruit in action. The Scripture describes how sin grows, that a person is tempted by his own disordered desire, which, when it has conceived, gives birth to sin, revealing the process by which the capital sins, the disordered desires of the heart, produce actual sins, for when a woman indulges a disordered desire, pride, envy, lust, or another, it conceives and gives birth to sinful thoughts, words, and deeds, so that the roots in the heart bear the fruit of sin in action. This means a woman sees how her particular sins grow from the disordered desires of the capital sins, so that she can trace her sins to their roots and address them there, understanding that sin begins in disordered desire and grows into act. The woman who understands how sin grows from desire traces her sins to the disordered desires that birth them, addressing the root. How sin grows from desire is shown in the capital sins, disordered desires that when indulged conceive and give birth to sinful acts, so that the roots in the heart produce the fruit of sin in action.

Knowing Your Own Roots

Because the capital sins work differently in each person, a woman grows by knowing which of them are most active in her own heart, identifying her particular root disorders so that she can address them specifically. The capital sins are present in every heart but operate with different strength in different people, so that a woman grows in self-knowledge and holiness by identifying which of the capital sins are most active and dangerous in her own heart, discerning her particular root disorders, the deep tendencies that most drive her sins, so that she can address them specifically rather than fighting sin in general. This means a woman does well to know her own roots, to discern which capital sins most govern her, so that she can direct her efforts at the deep disorders that most produce her sins, knowing her particular interior landscape rather than treating the capital sins only in the abstract. The woman who knows her own roots identifies the capital sins most active in her heart, addressing her particular disorders at the source. Knowing your own roots means identifying which of the capital sins are most active in a woman's own heart, so that she can address her particular root disorders specifically rather than fighting sin only in general.

CHAPTER SIX

How They Look in Women

The Capital Sins in a Woman's Heart

The capital sins often manifest differently in a woman's interior life than the obvious forms suggest, taking subtler and more relational shapes, so that naming these particular manifestations accurately is an act of mercy that helps a woman see her real disorders. Understanding how the capital sins often appear in a woman's heart, in their particular and sometimes hidden forms, helps a woman recognize the disorders she might otherwise miss.

Who can discern his errors? Declare me innocent from hidden faults. — Psalm 19:12

Pride as Self-Sufficiency

In a woman, pride often appears not as obvious arrogance but as a relentless self-sufficiency that refuses to need anyone, including God, so that it hides beneath competence and independence. Pride, the root of all the capital sins, often takes a particular shape in a woman's heart, appearing not so much as loud arrogance or boasting but as a relentless self-sufficiency, a refusal to need or depend on anyone, a determination to handle everything alone, which can hide beneath admirable competence and independence while being, at root, a prideful refusal to need others and even God. This means a woman may carry pride in a form she does not recognize, the self-sufficiency that will not ask for help or admit need, so that naming this manifestation helps her see a pride she might have mistaken for strength, the refusal to depend that keeps her from God and others. The woman who recognizes pride as self-sufficiency sees the hidden pride in her refusal to need anyone, including God. Pride as self-sufficiency is how pride often appears in a woman, not as arrogance but as a relentless refusal to need anyone, including God, so that it hides beneath competence and independence.

Envy and Anger in Relationship

In women, envy is often intimate and relational rather than public and competitive, and anger often turns inward or sideways rather than outward, so that these sins take hidden, relational forms a woman may not recognize. Several of the capital sins take particularly relational forms in a woman's heart, for envy in women is often not public and competitive but intimate and relational, a quiet resentment of those close to her or comparison with other women, and anger in women often does not erupt outwardly but turns inward as self-criticism or sideways as coldness, resentment, or passive hostility, so that these sins work in subtle, relational ways that may not look like the obvious forms. This means a woman may carry envy and anger in shapes she does not recognize, hidden in her relationships and her interior life, so that naming these manifestations helps her see the resentment, comparison, and buried anger that the obvious definitions might cause her to miss. The woman who recognizes envy and anger in relationship sees these sins in their hidden, relational forms, named so she can address them. Envy and anger in relationship often take intimate and hidden forms in women, envy as relational resentment and anger as inward or sideways hostility, so that these sins work subtly where a woman might not recognize them.

Sloth as Paralysis

In a woman, sloth often appears not as laziness but as a paralysis born of fear or despair, a spiritual discouragement that masquerades as being overwhelmed, so that naming it mercifully helps her see it for what it is. Sloth, which is a kind of spiritual laziness or neglect of the good, often takes a particular shape in a woman's heart, appearing not as obvious idleness, since many women are tirelessly busy, but as a paralysis born of fear or despair, a spiritual discouragement, a giving up on growth or prayer that can masquerade as simply being overwhelmed or too tired, so that sloth in women often hides as a fearful or despairing paralysis rather than laziness. This means a woman may carry sloth in a form she would never call laziness, the discouraged paralysis that stops reaching for God, so that naming this manifestation mercifully helps her see a spiritual discouragement she might have mistaken for mere exhaustion, and brings it, without shame, into the light. The woman who recognizes sloth as paralysis sees the fearful or despairing discouragement that the obvious definition of laziness would hide. Sloth as paralysis is how sloth often appears in a woman, not as laziness but as a paralysis born of fear or despair, a spiritual discouragement that masquerades as being overwhelmed.

CHAPTER SEVEN

Your Inner Guide

What Conscience Is and How to Form It

To navigate the interior landscape, a woman has an inner guide, her conscience, the judgment of her mind about what is right and wrong, which she must both form rightly and follow faithfully. Understanding what conscience is, how to form it, and the duty to follow it reveals the inner guide by which a woman walks the moral life.

They show that the work of the law is written on their hearts, while their conscience also bears witness. — Romans 2:15

The Voice Within

Conscience is the judgment of a woman's practical reason about whether a particular act is right or wrong, an inner witness to the moral law written on the heart, which she is bound to heed. Conscience is not a feeling or an arbitrary opinion but the judgment of practical reason, the inner voice by which a woman discerns whether a particular action is good or evil, applying the moral law to her concrete choices, a witness to the law God has written on the human heart, so that conscience is a real inner guide to right and wrong that a woman is bound to heed. This means a woman has in her conscience a genuine inner guide for the moral life, the judgment of her reason about right and wrong in particular situations, so that she must attend to this voice within, which bears witness to the moral law and directs her choices. The woman who understands conscience as the voice within attends to the judgment of her reason about right and wrong, her inner guide for the moral life. The voice within is conscience, the judgment of a woman's practical reason about whether an act is right or wrong, an inner witness to the moral law that she is bound to heed.

Forming the Conscience

Conscience is not infallible and must be formed, educated by the truth of God's law and the teaching of the Church, so that a woman shapes her conscience according to objective truth rather than mere feeling or preference. Though conscience must be followed, it is not automatically correct, for it can be mistaken or poorly formed, so that a woman has a duty to form her conscience, to educate it by the truth, the moral law, the Scripture, and the teaching of the Church, so that her conscience judges according to objective truth rather than mere feeling, cultural assumption, or self-interest, a well-formed conscience being one shaped by the truth God has revealed. This means a woman is responsible not only to follow her conscience but to form it rightly, shaping her inner judgment according to the truth rather than leaving it to feeling or preference, so that her conscience becomes a reliable guide by being educated in the truth. The woman who forms her conscience shapes it by the truth of God's law and the Church's teaching, making it a reliable guide.

Forming the conscience is a woman's duty, educating her inner judgment by the truth of God's law and the Church's teaching, so that her conscience judges according to objective truth rather than feeling or preference.

Following the Conscience

A woman is bound to follow her conscience, for she must act according to her sincere judgment of what is right, even as she takes responsibility for forming that judgment rightly. Once a woman has formed her conscience, she is bound to follow it, to act according to her sincere judgment of what is right and to refuse what she judges to be wrong, for to act against one's conscience is to act against one's own best judgment of the good and is itself wrong, so that a woman must follow her conscience even as she bears responsibility for having formed it well. This means a woman both forms and follows her conscience, obeying her sincere judgment of right and wrong while taking responsibility for shaping that judgment according to the truth, so that she walks the moral life guided by a conscience she has formed and faithfully follows. The woman who follows her conscience acts according to her sincere judgment of the good, guided by the inner voice she has formed. Following the conscience is a woman's duty, acting according to her sincere judgment of what is right, even as she takes responsibility for forming that judgment rightly by the truth.

CONCLUSION

Walk the Ground With Clear Sight

The woman who navigated her interior life without a map now has one. We have seen how to look at her own sin honestly and without shame, as an act of mercy; what sin actually is, a turning from love against God's law; what mortal sin is, in its three conditions and its killing of grace; what venial sin is, not deadly but real, the little foxes that spoil; the seven capital sins that are the roots of sin; how these capital sins particularly manifest in a woman's heart, in self-sufficient pride, relational envy and anger, and sloth as paralysis; and what conscience is, the inner guide she must form and follow.

Through all of it runs a single purpose: to walk the ground of your interior life with clear sight. The moral life is lived on the terrain of your own heart, and to live it well you must know that terrain, understanding sin honestly and without shame, recognizing the disorders at work in you, and following a well-formed conscience. This knowledge is not meant to shame you but to free you, giving you the clear sight that makes real growth and real Confession possible.

So walk the ground with clear sight. Look at your sin honestly, without minimizing or despairing, as an act of mercy toward yourself. Understand sin as a turning from love, and take it seriously. Know what mortal sin is, and the necessity of Confession to restore the life of God. Do not treat venial sin casually, but attend to the little foxes that spoil the vineyard. Learn the capital sins that are the roots of your particular sins, and know which are most active in you. Recognize their particular shapes in a woman's heart, the self-sufficient pride, the relational envy and anger, the slothful paralysis, naming them without shame. And form and follow your conscience, your inner guide. You cannot navigate an interior landscape you do not know. Now you can walk it with clear sight, honestly and without shame, toward the healing and forgiveness that clear sight makes possible.

✦ ✦ ✦

The Interior Landscape is part of The Daily Bread Library.