INTRODUCTION

When Confession Changes Nothing

Many women go to Confession faithfully and leave with the uneasy sense that nothing has changed. They confess the same handful of sins they always confess, in the same vague terms, hear the same words of absolution, and return to the same patterns, so that Confession becomes a routine they maintain rather than an encounter that transforms them. The problem is rarely the sacrament, which is powerful, but the way it is approached, with a hurried and shallow examination, a weak sorrow, and no real resolve to change, so that the grace available in the sacrament meets little to work with. A woman who wants Confession to change something must learn to examine her conscience honestly and to approach the sacrament in a way that opens her to its transforming grace.

This book is about exactly that, making an honest examination of conscience and a confession that actually changes something. It will diagnose why Confession so often goes stale; it will teach the daily examination of conscience as a practice; it will show how to prepare for Confession with a thorough and honest examination; it will walk through the five acts of the penitent that make a good confession; it will go to the heart of the matter in real contrition and firm purpose of amendment; it will help a woman overcome the fear, shame, routine, and scrupulosity that hold her back; and it will show how to make Confession genuinely transformative. The aim is not more frequent but more fruitful Confession, so that the sacrament becomes what it is meant to be, an encounter with God's mercy that actually changes a woman's life.

If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness. — 1 John 1:9

The Scripture promises that if a woman confesses her sins, God is faithful to forgive and to cleanse her, so that Confession is a sure encounter with God's cleansing mercy. This book will help her make that encounter fruitful: diagnosing why Confession goes stale; practicing the daily examen; preparing honestly; making the five acts of the penitent; cultivating real contrition and firm purpose; overcoming what holds her back; and making Confession transformative. A woman may go to Confession and find that nothing changes. This book will help her examine honestly and confess well, so that the sacrament becomes an encounter that actually changes something in her life.

CHAPTER ONE

Why Confession Goes Stale

The Honest Diagnosis

Before a woman can make Confession fruitful, she must honestly diagnose why it so often goes stale, becoming a routine recitation of the same sins with no real change, for understanding the problem is the first step to solving it. Understanding why Confession goes stale, the shallow examination and weak resolve that leave the sacrament fruitless, prepares a woman to approach it differently.

You have abandoned the love you had at first. Remember therefore from where you have fallen, and repent. — Revelation 2:4-5

The Same Sins, the Same Words

Confession goes stale when it becomes a routine recitation of the same sins in the same vague terms, a formula performed rather than an honest and searching encounter. The staleness of Confession often shows itself in sameness, for a woman confesses the same short list of sins she always confesses, in the same vague and general terms, hears the same absolution, and leaves unchanged, so that Confession becomes a routine recitation, a formula performed by habit rather than an honest, searching, and particular encounter with her actual sins and God's mercy. This means a woman can recognize the staleness in the sameness of her Confessions, the vague and repetitive recitation that never goes deeper, so that she sees the problem is not the sacrament but her shallow and routine approach to it, which she can change. The woman who recognizes the same sins, the same words sees the routine staleness of her Confession and the need to approach it more honestly. The same sins, the same words mark a stale Confession, a routine recitation in vague terms rather than an honest and searching encounter, so that the problem is the shallow approach and not the sacrament.

Shallow Examination, Weak Sorrow

Confession goes stale chiefly because of a shallow examination that never reaches the real sins and a weak sorrow that does not truly grieve them, so that the sacrament meets little to work with. The deeper causes of stale Confession are a shallow examination of conscience, which skims the surface and never reaches a woman's real and particular sins or their roots, and a weak sorrow, a vague regret rather than genuine contrition, so that she brings to the sacrament little honest self-knowledge and little real grief, and the transforming grace of the sacrament has little to work with in a heart that has not truly examined or truly grieved. This means the staleness of Confession is largely a matter of a shallow examination and a weak sorrow, so that a woman can make Confession fruitful by examining more honestly and grieving more truly, bringing to the sacrament the depth it requires to transform her. The woman who sees the shallow examination and weak sorrow understands why her Confession is fruitless and what must deepen. Shallow examination, weak sorrow are the chief causes of stale Confession, for a surface examination never reaches a woman's real sins and a vague regret does not truly grieve them, so that the sacrament meets little to work with.

The Call to Deepen

The remedy for stale Confession is not to abandon it but to deepen it, to recover the fervor that routine has lost by examining more honestly, grieving more truly, and resolving more firmly. The answer to stale Confession is not to give up on the sacrament but to deepen a woman's approach to it, to remember from where she has fallen into routine and to recover the fervor that has grown cold, by making a more honest examination, cultivating a truer sorrow, and forming a firmer resolve to change, so that she brings to the sacrament the depth and earnestness that let its grace transform her. This means a woman called to deepen her Confession does not despair of the sacrament but renews her approach to it, examining and grieving and resolving more deeply, so that the staleness gives way to a fruitful encounter with God's mercy. The woman who hears the call to deepen renews her approach to Confession, recovering its fervor through honest examination, true sorrow, and firm resolve. The call to deepen is the remedy for stale Confession, not abandoning the sacrament but recovering its fervor through a more honest examination, a truer sorrow, and a firmer resolve to change.

CHAPTER TWO

The Daily Examen

Reviewing the Day With God

The foundation of a fruitful Confession is laid not only just before the sacrament but daily, through the practice of the examination of conscience, a brief review of the day with God that keeps a woman honest and aware of her interior life. Understanding the daily examen, how to review the day with God, gives a woman a practice that keeps her self-knowledge current and makes her eventual Confessions far more fruitful.

Let us test and examine our ways, and return to the Lord. — Lamentations 3:40

A Brief Daily Review

The daily examen is a brief, regular review of the day before God, in which a woman looks back over her hours, noticing where she has loved and where she has failed, so that she keeps honest watch over her interior life. The examination of conscience is not only for the moments before Confession but is best practiced daily, as a brief review of the day before God, in which a woman looks back over her hours, giving thanks for the good, noticing where she has responded to grace and where she has failed, where she has loved and where she has sinned, so that she keeps a regular, honest watch over her interior life. This means a woman benefits from a short daily examen, a few minutes of reviewing her day with God, which keeps her aware of her interior life and her sins while they are fresh, so that her self-knowledge stays current rather than being attempted only in a rush before Confession. The woman who makes a brief daily review keeps honest watch over her interior life, aware of her sins and graces day by day. A brief daily review is the examen, a short regular looking back over the day before God, so that a woman keeps honest watch over her interior life, noticing where she has loved and where she has failed.

Noticing the Patterns

The daily examen helps a woman notice the patterns of her interior life, the recurring sins and their triggers, so that over time she comes to know her real struggles rather than only isolated faults. Practiced over time, the daily examen reveals not only isolated sins but patterns, for a woman begins to notice the recurring faults, the situations that tempt her, the roots beneath her particular sins, the times and circumstances where she repeatedly fails, so that she comes to know the real patterns of her interior life rather than seeing only scattered incidents. This means the daily examen builds a true self-knowledge over time, helping a woman see the patterns and roots of her sins, so that she can bring to Confession not merely a list of isolated faults but an understanding of her real struggles and their sources. The woman who notices the patterns through her daily examen comes to know her recurring sins and their roots, deepening her self-knowledge. Noticing the patterns is a fruit of the daily examen, which over time reveals a woman's recurring sins and their triggers, so that she comes to know her real struggles rather than only isolated faults.

Keeping Short Accounts With God

The daily examen lets a woman keep short accounts with God, acknowledging and repenting of her sins each day rather than letting them accumulate, so that she lives in ongoing reconciliation and comes to Confession already aware. By examining her conscience daily, a woman keeps short accounts with God, acknowledging her sins each day, repenting of them, asking forgiveness, and resolving to do better, rather than letting her faults pile up unexamined until a rushed Confession, so that she lives in ongoing honesty and reconciliation with God and comes to the sacrament already aware of her sins. This means the daily examen keeps a woman current with God, dealing with her sins daily rather than letting them accumulate, so that her Confessions are informed by a self-knowledge already gathered and her life stays in ongoing reconciliation rather than drifting between sacraments. The woman who keeps short accounts with God through the daily examen lives in ongoing honesty and comes to Confession already aware of her sins. Keeping short accounts with God is the fruit of the daily examen, acknowledging and repenting of sins each day rather than letting them accumulate, so that a woman lives in ongoing reconciliation and comes to Confession already aware.

CHAPTER THREE

Preparing to Confess

A Thorough and Honest Examination

Before approaching the sacrament, a woman makes a more thorough examination of conscience, searching her heart honestly to bring her real sins to Confession rather than a vague and surface list. Understanding how to prepare for Confession with a thorough and honest examination equips a woman to bring her actual sins, in their real particularity, to the sacrament.

Let a person examine himself, then, and so eat of the bread and drink of the cup. — 1 Corinthians 11:28

Searching Beneath the Surface

A thorough examination searches beneath the surface, past the obvious and habitual sins to the deeper faults, roots, and patterns a woman might prefer not to see. Preparing well for Confession means searching beneath the surface of one's life, not stopping at the few obvious sins one always notices but looking deeper, at the roots beneath them, at the subtler sins of thought and omission, at the patterns and attitudes that drive one's faults, at the areas one would prefer not to examine, so that the examination reaches the real and deeper truth of a woman's sins rather than skimming the surface. This means a woman prepares for Confession by examining honestly and deeply, searching beneath her surface sins to the roots and patterns and hidden faults, so that she brings to the sacrament not a shallow list but the real truth of her interior life, which is what the grace of Confession can transform. The woman who searches beneath the surface brings her real and deeper sins to Confession, not merely the obvious ones. Searching beneath the surface is how a woman prepares for Confession, looking past the obvious sins to the deeper faults, roots, and patterns, so that she brings the real truth of her interior life to the sacrament.

Honest and Specific

A good examination is honest and specific, naming a woman's actual sins in their particularity rather than in vague generalities, so that she confesses what she really did rather than a blurred summary. The examination that prepares for a fruitful Confession is honest and specific, for vague generalities, confessing that one was impatient or unkind in the abstract, do not reach the reality, while naming one's actual sins specifically, the particular impatience, the specific unkindness, the real failure, brings the truth to light, so that a woman examines herself honestly, without excuse or evasion, and specifically, identifying her real and particular sins. This means a woman prepares for Confession by being honest and specific, naming her actual sins as they really happened rather than hiding behind vague summaries, so that she confesses the real truth of her failings and gives the sacrament something real to work with. The woman who is honest and specific names her actual sins in their particularity, bringing the real truth to Confession. Honest and specific is how a woman should examine herself, naming her actual sins in their particularity rather than vague generalities, so that she confesses what she really did and gives the sacrament something real to work with.

Guided Examination

A woman can make her examination more thorough by using a guide, such as the Ten Commandments, the capital sins, or her duties, which prompts her to search areas she might otherwise overlook. To examine thoroughly, a woman can use a guide, a structured examination of conscience based on the Ten Commandments, the capital sins, the duties of her state in life, or the two great commandments of love, which prompts her to consider areas she might otherwise forget and helps her search her conscience systematically rather than only recalling the sins that happen to come to mind. This means a woman benefits from a guided examination, using a framework that leads her through the areas of her life and prompts honest reflection, so that her examination is thorough and complete rather than haphazard, reaching sins she might otherwise overlook. The woman who uses a guided examination searches her conscience systematically, reaching sins she might otherwise miss. Guided examination uses a structure such as the Commandments, the capital sins, or one's duties to prompt a thorough search, so that a woman examines herself systematically and reaches sins she might otherwise overlook.

CHAPTER FOUR

The Five Acts of the Penitent

The Shape of a Good Confession

A good confession has a clear shape, the five acts of the penitent, examination of conscience, contrition, firm purpose of amendment, confession of sins, and satisfaction, which together make the sacrament complete and fruitful. Understanding the five acts of the penitent gives a woman the structure of a good confession, so that she brings to the sacrament all that it requires.

I will arise and go to my father, and I will say to him, Father, I have sinned against heaven and before you. — Luke 15:18

Examination and Contrition

The first two acts of the penitent are examination of conscience, by which a woman comes to know her sins, and contrition, by which she is truly sorry for them, so that she brings both honest self-knowledge and genuine sorrow to the sacrament. A good confession begins with the examination of conscience, the honest searching of the heart by which a woman comes to know her sins, and proceeds to contrition, the genuine sorrow for having offended God, so that the first two acts of the penitent provide the knowledge of her sins and the sorrow for them that are the foundation of a good confession, bringing both honest self-knowledge and real grief to the sacrament. This means a woman's confession rests first on examination and contrition, knowing her sins and being truly sorry for them, so that she comes to the sacrament having searched her heart and grieved her sins, the necessary beginning of the five acts. The woman who makes examination and contrition brings honest self-knowledge and genuine sorrow to the sacrament, the foundation of a good confession. Examination and contrition are the first two acts of the penitent, coming to know one's sins and being truly sorry for them, so that a woman brings honest self-knowledge and genuine sorrow to the sacrament.

Firm Purpose and Confession

The next two acts are a firm purpose of amendment, the real resolve to change and avoid the sin, and the confession itself, the honest telling of her sins to the priest, so that a woman resolves to amend and actually confesses. The third act of the penitent is a firm purpose of amendment, a sincere resolve to change, to avoid the sin and its occasions in the future, and the fourth is the confession itself, the honest telling of her sins to the priest, so that a woman both resolves not to sin again and actually names her sins aloud in the sacrament, these two acts together moving from the interior resolve to the actual confession. This means a woman's confession includes a real resolve to change and the honest naming of her sins to the priest, so that she does not merely regret her sins but purposes to amend and actually confesses them, carrying the interior acts into the sacramental telling. The woman who makes a firm purpose and confession resolves to change and honestly names her sins to the priest, carrying contrition into the sacrament. Firm purpose and confession are the third and fourth acts, the real resolve to change and the honest telling of one's sins to the priest, so that a woman both purposes to amend and actually confesses her sins.

Satisfaction

The fifth act is satisfaction, the penance a woman performs after Confession, which makes amends and helps repair the harm of sin, so that the sacrament is completed by her acceptance and fulfillment of the penance given. The final act of the penitent is satisfaction, the carrying out of the penance assigned by the priest, which expresses a woman's repentance, makes some amends for her sins, and helps repair the disorder sin has caused, so that the sacrament is completed when she accepts and fulfills the penance given, a real if small act of making satisfaction for her sins. This means a woman completes her confession by performing her penance, the act of satisfaction that expresses her repentance and helps repair the harm of sin, so that she does not leave the sacrament unfinished but carries out the penance that completes it. The woman who makes satisfaction performs her penance, completing the sacrament and making amends for her sins. Satisfaction is the fifth act of the penitent, the performing of the penance assigned, which makes amends and helps repair the harm of sin, so that the sacrament is completed by a woman's acceptance and fulfillment of her penance.

CHAPTER FIVE

The Heart of It

Real Contrition, Real Resolve

At the heart of a confession that changes something lie two acts above all, real contrition, a genuine sorrow for sin, and firm purpose of amendment, a real resolve to change, for without these the sacrament remains routine. Understanding real contrition and firm purpose, the heart of a transforming confession, shows a woman what makes the difference between a routine confession and one that actually changes her.

The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit; a broken and contrite heart, O God, you will not despise. — Psalm 51:17

Genuine Sorrow

Real contrition is a genuine sorrow for sin, not a vague regret or a formal admission but a true grief at having offended God, which is the sacrifice God does not despise. The contrition that makes a confession fruitful is genuine sorrow, not a vague or formal regret but a real grief of the heart at having offended God and wounded love, a true sorrow that comes from recognizing sin for what it is and being grieved by it, so that a woman's contrition is a broken and contrite heart, the sacrifice God does not despise, rather than a perfunctory admission. This means a woman seeks a real and genuine sorrow for her sins, not manufacturing feeling but truly grieving her offenses against God, so that her contrition is heartfelt rather than formal, the real sorrow that opens her to the transforming mercy of the sacrament. The woman who brings genuine sorrow to Confession grieves her sins truly, offering the broken and contrite heart God does not despise. Genuine sorrow is the contrition that makes confession fruitful, a true grief at having offended God rather than a vague regret, so that a woman offers the broken and contrite heart God will not despise.

Perfect and Imperfect Contrition

Contrition is deepest when it springs from love of God, sorrow for having offended the God she loves, though sorrow arising from fear of the consequences of sin is also real and sufficient for the sacrament. The Church distinguishes two kinds of contrition, perfect contrition, which arises from love of God and sorrow for having offended Him for His own sake, and imperfect contrition, which arises from other motives such as fear of punishment or the ugliness of sin, and while perfect contrition is the deepest and most purifying, imperfect contrition is also genuine and sufficient for the sacrament, so that a woman need not achieve perfect love to make a good confession, though she does well to seek the deeper sorrow of love. This means a woman can be assured that her contrition, even if it begins in fear or shame rather than pure love, is real and sufficient for the sacrament, while she aspires to the deeper contrition that springs from love of God, so that she is neither scrupulous about her motives nor content to remain at the shallowest sorrow. The woman who understands perfect and imperfect contrition is assured her sorrow is sufficient while aspiring to the deeper contrition of love. Perfect and imperfect contrition differ in motive, the one springing from love of God and the other from fear or the ugliness of sin, so that a woman's contrition is sufficient for the sacrament even when imperfect, though she seeks the deeper sorrow of love.

A Real Resolve to Change

The firm purpose of amendment is a real resolve to change, to turn from the sin and avoid its occasions, and this resolve, more than anything, makes a confession transformative rather than routine. What most distinguishes a transforming confession from a routine one is a firm purpose of amendment, a real and sincere resolve to change, to turn from the sin confessed and to avoid the occasions that lead to it, for a confession without any real intention to change is hollow, while a confession joined to a genuine resolve to amend opens a woman to the grace that actually transforms, so that the firm purpose is the hinge of a fruitful confession. This means a woman makes her confession transformative by bringing to it a real resolve to change, not merely confessing her sins but sincerely purposing to turn from them, so that her firm purpose of amendment, joined to grace, moves her confession from routine repetition toward real change. The woman who brings a real resolve to change makes her confession transformative, purposing sincerely to turn from the sins she confesses. A real resolve to change is the firm purpose of amendment, the sincere intention to turn from sin and avoid its occasions, which more than anything makes a confession transformative rather than routine.

CHAPTER SIX

What Holds You Back

Fear, Shame, and Scruples

Many women are held back from fruitful Confession by fear, shame, embarrassment, routine, or scrupulosity, and overcoming these obstacles is necessary to approach the sacrament freely and well. Understanding what holds a woman back from Confession and how to overcome it frees her to approach the sacrament of mercy without the fears and distortions that would hinder her.

Though your sins are like scarlet, they shall be as white as snow. — Isaiah 1:18

Fear and Shame

Fear of the sacrament and shame over one's sins hold many women back, but these are overcome by remembering that Confession is an encounter with mercy, where the worst sins are washed white as snow. The most common obstacles to Confession are fear, the dread of confessing, of the priest's reaction, of saying one's sins aloud, and shame, the embarrassment and self-condemnation that make a woman want to hide her sins, but these are overcome by remembering what Confession truly is, an encounter with God's mercy where even the worst sins are forgiven and the soul is washed white as snow, so that there is nothing to fear and no sin too shameful to bring. This means a woman overcomes fear and shame by recalling the mercy that awaits her in Confession, where her sins, however scarlet, are made white, so that she comes not to be condemned but to be forgiven, freed from the fear and shame that would keep her away. The woman who overcomes fear and shame remembers that Confession is an encounter with mercy, approaching it freely rather than in dread. Fear and shame hold many women back from Confession, but these are overcome by remembering that it is an encounter with mercy, where even scarlet sins are made white as snow, so that there is nothing to dread.

Routine and Embarrassment

Routine dulls Confession into a formality, and embarrassment makes a woman soften or hide her real sins, but both are overcome by approaching the sacrament honestly and remembering the priest is a minister of mercy bound to secrecy. Two further obstacles are routine, which reduces Confession to an empty formality performed without thought, and embarrassment, which tempts a woman to soften, excuse, or omit her most humiliating sins, but routine is overcome by approaching each Confession freshly and honestly, and embarrassment by remembering that the priest is a minister of God's mercy, bound to absolute secrecy, who has heard every kind of sin and is there not to judge but to forgive, so that a woman can confess even her most embarrassing sins. This means a woman overcomes routine by a renewed honesty and embarrassment by trust in the priest's role and the seal of Confession, so that she neither performs the sacrament emptily nor hides her real sins, but confesses honestly and completely. The woman who overcomes routine and embarrassment confesses freshly and honestly, trusting the priest as a minister of mercy bound to secrecy. Routine and embarrassment are overcome by approaching Confession honestly and remembering the priest is a minister of mercy bound to secrecy, so that a woman neither performs the sacrament emptily nor hides her real sins.

The Trap of Scrupulosity

Some women are held back not by laxity but by scrupulosity, an excessive and anxious fear of sin that torments the conscience, and this too must be overcome, through trust in God's mercy and the guidance of a confessor. A less obvious obstacle is scrupulosity, an excessive and anxious preoccupation with sin that sees grave sin where there is none, doubts forgiveness already given, and torments a woman with fear, and this distortion, the opposite of laxity, also hinders fruitful Confession, so that it must be overcome, not by more anxious examination but by trust in God's mercy, obedience to a confessor's guidance, and the refusal to indulge the anxious doubts, so that a scrupulous woman finds peace rather than torment in the sacrament. This means a woman troubled by scrupulosity overcomes it by trusting God's mercy and submitting to the guidance of a confessor rather than her own anxious judgment, so that Confession becomes a source of peace rather than a trigger for torment. The woman who escapes the trap of scrupulosity trusts God's mercy and her confessor's guidance rather than her anxious fears, finding peace in the sacrament. The trap of scrupulosity, an excessive and anxious fear of sin, holds some women back, overcome not by more anxious examination but by trust in God's mercy and the guidance of a confessor, so that Confession becomes peace rather than torment.

CHAPTER SEVEN

Confession That Changes You

Making the Sacrament Transformative

Beyond a valid confession lies a transforming one, and a woman makes Confession actually change her by going to the roots, forming specific resolutions, following through, and confessing regularly, so that the sacrament becomes an engine of real growth. Understanding how to make Confession transformative rather than routine shows a woman how to let the sacrament actually change her life over time.

Neither do I condemn you; go, and from now on sin no more. — John 8:11

Going to the Root

Confession changes a woman when she goes to the root of her sins, confessing not only the surface acts but the deeper patterns and disorders beneath them, so that the sacrament addresses the source and not only the symptoms. To make Confession transformative, a woman goes beyond confessing isolated acts to addressing the roots beneath them, the deeper patterns, attitudes, and capital sins from which her particular sins spring, so that she brings to the sacrament not only the symptoms but the source, allowing grace to work at the deeper level where lasting change happens, rather than endlessly confessing the same surface sins without touching their cause. This means a woman makes her Confession fruitful by going to the root, naming and seeking grace for the deeper disorders beneath her recurring sins, so that the sacrament addresses the source of her sins and works real change rather than merely treating the surface. The woman who goes to the root brings the deeper patterns of her sins to Confession, letting grace work real change at their source. Going to the root makes Confession transformative, a woman confessing not only surface acts but the deeper patterns and disorders beneath them, so that grace works at the source where lasting change happens.

Specific Resolutions and Follow-Through

Confession changes a woman when it issues in specific resolutions and real follow-through, concrete steps to amend joined to the grace of the sacrament, so that her resolve to change becomes action. A transforming confession does not end with vague good intentions but with specific resolutions, concrete and achievable steps to avoid a particular sin or grow in a particular virtue, and with real follow-through, the actual carrying out of those resolutions after Confession with the help of grace, so that a woman's firm purpose becomes a definite plan and an actual effort rather than a feeling that fades, the resolve translated into change. This means a woman makes Confession change her by forming specific resolutions and following through on them, joining her concrete effort to the grace of the sacrament, so that her good intentions become real steps and the sacrament bears fruit in actual amendment. The woman who makes specific resolutions and follows through turns her confession into real change, her resolve translated into action by grace. Specific resolutions and follow-through make Confession transformative, concrete steps to amend joined to real effort after the sacrament, so that a woman's resolve to change becomes action rather than a fading feeling.

Regular Confession

Confession changes a woman most through regularity, for frequent Confession keeps her soul cleansed, her self-knowledge sharp, and her growth steady, so that the sacrament becomes an ongoing engine of transformation rather than a rare event. The transforming power of Confession is realized most fully through regularity, for frequent Confession, rather than occasional or rare recourse to the sacrament, keeps a woman's soul regularly cleansed, her conscience sharp, her sins addressed before they harden, and her growth steady, so that regular Confession becomes an ongoing means of transformation, each confession building on the last in a sustained work of grace. This means a woman makes Confession an engine of real change by going regularly, not waiting for rare occasions but returning frequently, so that the sacrament works its transformation steadily over time, keeping her cleansed and growing rather than touching her only now and then. The woman who confesses regularly makes the sacrament an ongoing engine of transformation, cleansed and growing through frequent recourse to mercy. Regular Confession realizes the sacrament's transforming power, for frequent recourse keeps a woman cleansed, self-aware, and steadily growing, so that Confession becomes an ongoing engine of change rather than a rare event.

CONCLUSION

Go, and Be Changed

The woman whose Confessions changed nothing now knows how to make an honest examination and a transforming confession. We have seen why Confession goes stale, in shallow examination and weak sorrow; how to practice the daily examen, reviewing the day with God; how to prepare with a thorough and honest examination; the five acts of the penitent that shape a good confession; the heart of it in real contrition and firm purpose; how to overcome the fear, shame, routine, and scrupulosity that hold her back; and how to make Confession genuinely transformative, going to the root, resolving specifically, and confessing regularly.

Through all of it runs a single hope: go, and be changed. Confession is not meant to be an empty routine but a true encounter with God's mercy that actually changes a woman's life, and approached honestly and well, with real self-knowledge, real sorrow, and real resolve, it becomes exactly that. The Lord who says He does not condemn you also says, go, and sin no more, offering not only forgiveness but the grace to change.

So go, and be changed. Diagnose honestly why your Confessions have gone stale, and resolve to deepen them. Practice the daily examen, keeping short accounts with God. Prepare with a thorough and honest examination that searches beneath the surface. Bring all five acts of the penitent to the sacrament. Above all, cultivate real contrition and a real resolve to change, the heart of a transforming confession. Overcome the fear, shame, routine, and scrupulosity that hold you back, trusting the mercy that makes scarlet sins white. And make your Confession transformative by going to the root, forming specific resolutions, following through, and confessing regularly. Confession can change something. Approach it honestly and well, and go, and be changed, for the Lord does not condemn you but forgives you and gives you the grace to sin no more.
