THE DAILY BREAD

The Missio of the Beloved

Handling Hard Questions Without Fear

A FORMATION BOOK BY

Kendall Peterson

The Everyday Apostle

THE DAILY BREAD

Missio of the Beloved

Handling Hard Questions Without Fear

Honest Answers to the Objections You Will Meet

✦ ✦ ✦

A Daily Bread Formation Book

The Everyday Apostle

INTRODUCTION

The Questions You Will Actually Be Asked

Having grasped the posture of apologetics, the gentleness, the confidence, the goal of the open door, a woman still faces the concrete reality that people will ask her specific hard questions, and she wants to know how to actually answer them. These are not abstract puzzles but the real objections that come up at the dinner table, in the office, and from her own children: if God is good, why is there so much suffering? Why do Catholics seem to worship Mary? Why does the Church teach what it does about sex and marriage? How can an educated person believe in a resurrection? And hasn't the Church itself done terrible things? A woman does well to have thought through honest, accessible responses to these common questions before they come, so that she can meet them without fear.

This book offers honest, accessible responses to the hard questions a woman will actually be asked. It will address the problem of suffering; the Catholic honoring of Mary and the saints; the Church's teaching on sex and marriage; the reasonableness of believing in the Resurrection; the Church's real failures and how to speak of them honestly; the relationship of faith to reason and science; and a transferable method for handling any question she has not met before. The aim is wholly practical, to give a woman thought-through responses to the common objections, so that when the hard questions come, as they will, she can handle them with calm, honesty, and confidence rather than fear.

Do not be anxious how you are to speak or what you are to say… for it is not you who speak, but the Spirit of your Father speaking through you. — Matthew 10:19-20

Christ told His followers not to be anxious about how they would answer when challenged, promising that the Spirit would give them words, and this frees a woman to handle hard questions without fear, trusting that she does not face them alone. This book will give her thought-through answers to the questions she will actually be asked, but underneath the preparation lies this deeper confidence, that the Spirit is with her as she speaks. A woman need not dread the hard questions or be paralyzed by them, for she can prepare honest responses and trust God to help her in the moment. This book is about handling the real objections to the faith, so that she meets them not with anxiety but with calm and confidence.

CHAPTER ONE

The Problem of Suffering

If God Is Good, Why Do We Suffer?

Perhaps the hardest question of all is why a good and all-powerful God permits so much suffering, and a woman does well to be able to respond to it thoughtfully and compassionately, for behind the question often lies real pain. Understanding how to address the problem of suffering equips a woman to meet one of the deepest objections with both honesty and tenderness.

And we know that for those who love God all things work together for good, for those who are called according to his purpose. — Romans 8:28

Honoring the Weight of the Question

A woman responds to the problem of suffering first by honoring its weight, acknowledging that it is a real and serious question often arising from genuine pain rather than mere argument. The question of suffering deserves to be met with seriousness, not a glib answer, for it is the deepest objection to faith and often arises not from cool debate but from real grief and pain, so that a woman responds first by honoring the weight of the question, acknowledging the reality and horror of suffering, refusing to minimize it or offer easy platitudes, and showing compassion for whatever pain may lie behind the asking, meeting the question with the gravity and tenderness it deserves. This means a woman honors the weight of the problem of suffering, acknowledging its seriousness and the pain often behind it, so that she responds with compassion and gravity rather than glib answers or minimizing. The woman who honors the weight of the question meets suffering with seriousness and tenderness. Honoring the weight of the question means acknowledging the reality of suffering and the pain behind it, so that a woman responds with gravity and compassion rather than platitudes.

Free Will and a World That Can Be Loved

A woman can explain that much suffering flows from the free will God gave, the freedom that makes genuine love possible but also allows evil, a price of a world capable of love. A central part of the Christian response to suffering is free will, for God made creatures genuinely free so that they could truly love, since love that is forced is not love, and this same freedom that makes love possible also allows the choice of evil, so that much suffering flows from the misuse of human freedom, the price of a world in which real love and real goodness are possible, and a woman can explain that God permits the freedom from which evil comes because without it there could be no genuine love. This means a woman can offer the response of free will, explaining that much suffering flows from the freedom that makes love possible, so that she helps the questioner see why God permits a world capable of both love and evil. The woman who understands free will and a world that can be loved explains why God permits the freedom from which evil comes. Free will and a world that can be loved explain much suffering, for the freedom that makes genuine love possible also allows evil.

The God Who Suffered With Us

The deepest Christian answer to suffering is not an explanation but the Cross, the God who did not stay distant from our pain but entered it, suffering with us and redeeming it. The most profound Christian response to suffering is not a complete explanation but the Cross, for Christianity proclaims a God who did not remain aloof from human suffering but entered it fully, suffering and dying Himself, so that God does not merely permit suffering from a distance but has joined us in it, transforming it from within and bringing good out of it, and a woman can point to the Cross as God's own answer to suffering, the God who suffered with us and for us, able to redeem even suffering and bring good from it. This means a woman points to the God who suffered with us as the deepest answer to suffering, so that she offers not a tidy explanation but the Cross, where God entered human pain and redeemed it. The woman who understands the God who suffered with us points to the Cross as God's answer to suffering. The God who suffered with us is the deepest Christian answer, for God entered our pain in Christ, suffering with us and redeeming it rather than explaining it away.

CHAPTER TWO

Mary and the Saints

Do Catholics Worship Them?

A common objection, especially from other Christians, is that Catholics worship Mary and the saints, and a woman does well to be able to explain clearly the difference between the honor and intercession the Church offers them and the worship due to God alone. Understanding how to answer this clears up one of the most frequent misunderstandings about the faith.

The prayer of a righteous person has great power as it is working. — James 5:16

Worship Belongs to God Alone

A woman answers the charge clearly by affirming that Catholics worship God alone, never Mary or the saints, who are honored but not adored. The first and clearest point in answering this objection is that Catholics worship God alone, for the worship and adoration due to God are given to Him only, never to Mary or the saints, so that the Church draws a firm distinction between the worship owed to God and the honor given to the saints, and a woman can state plainly that Catholics do not worship Mary, that worship belongs to God alone, correcting the misunderstanding at its root by affirming that no creature, however holy, receives the adoration due to God. This means a woman affirms clearly that worship belongs to God alone and that Catholics do not worship Mary or the saints, so that she corrects the central misunderstanding by distinguishing worship, given only to God, from the honor given to the saints. The woman who affirms worship belongs to God alone corrects the charge at its root. Worship belongs to God alone, so that a woman clarifies Catholics do not worship Mary or the saints but honor them while adoring God only.

Honoring, Not Adoring

A woman explains that Catholics honor Mary and the saints as God's holy ones and heroes of faith, a reverence like honoring the great, not the adoration due only to God. Catholics honor Mary and the saints without adoring them, for honoring holy people is natural and good, as we honor heroes, great figures, and those we admire, and the saints are God's holy ones, examples of faith and friends of God worthy of honor and love, so that the reverence Catholics show them is honor and affection, not the worship due to God, and a woman can explain that honoring Mary as the mother of the Lord and the saints as God's heroes is no more worship than honoring any great or beloved person, the distinction between honoring and adoring being the key. This means a woman explains that Catholics honor rather than adore Mary and the saints, so that she shows the reverence given them is like honoring the great and holy, not the worship reserved for God. The woman who explains honoring, not adoring, shows the reverence given the saints is not worship. Honoring, not adoring, is what Catholics give Mary and the saints, so that a woman explains their reverence as honor for God's holy ones, not the worship due to God.

Asking Their Prayers

A woman explains that praying to the saints means asking them to pray for us, as we ask friends on earth to pray, since the saints in heaven are alive in Christ and their prayers have power. The practice of praying to the saints is best explained as asking for their prayers, for when Catholics pray to a saint they are asking that saint to intercede with God on their behalf, just as we ask friends and family on earth to pray for us, and since the saints in heaven are not dead but alive in Christ and close to God, asking their prayers is natural, the prayer of the righteous having great power, so that a woman can explain that praying to the saints is asking the holy ones in heaven to pray for us, not worshiping them or bypassing God. This means a woman explains that asking the saints' prayers is like asking any friend to pray, so that she shows intercession to the saints as a request for prayer rather than worship, the saints alive in Christ and their prayers powerful. The woman who explains asking their prayers shows intercession as a request for prayer, not worship. Asking their prayers means requesting the saints to intercede, as we ask friends to pray, so that a woman shows the practice as intercession rather than worship.

CHAPTER THREE

The Church and the Body

Why These Teachings on Sex and Marriage?

Among the hardest questions a woman faces is why the Church teaches what it does about sex, marriage, and the body, teachings the culture finds strange or oppressive, and she does well to be able to present the positive vision behind them rather than a list of prohibitions. Understanding how to explain these teachings lets a woman reveal the beauty of a vision often caricatured.

Therefore a man shall leave his father and his mother and hold fast to his wife, and they shall become one flesh. — Genesis 2:24

Not Arbitrary Rules but a Vision

A woman explains that the Church's teachings on sex and marriage are not arbitrary prohibitions but flow from a positive vision of the human person, the body, and love. The Church's teachings on sexuality and marriage are often heard as arbitrary rules and prohibitions, but a woman can explain that they are not arbitrary at all, flowing instead from a positive and coherent vision of the human person, the meaning of the body, and the nature of love, so that each teaching expresses an underlying vision of what sex, marriage, and the body are for, and the Church forbids certain things not to spoil pleasure but because she holds a particular and beautiful understanding of the person that these teachings protect, the vision coming first and the rules following from it. This means a woman explains that the Church's teachings on sex and marriage flow from a positive vision rather than arbitrary rules, so that she presents them as expressions of an understanding of the person rather than a list of prohibitions. The woman who explains it is not arbitrary rules but a vision reveals the understanding behind the teachings. Not arbitrary rules but a vision, the Church's teachings on sex and marriage flow from a positive understanding of the person, the body, and love.

The Meaning of the Body and Sexuality

A woman can explain that the Church sees the body and sexuality as deeply meaningful, the sexual union designed to express total, faithful, life-giving love within marriage. Central to the Church's vision is that the body and sexuality are deeply meaningful rather than trivial, for the Church teaches that the sexual union is designed by God to express and embody a total, faithful, and life-giving love, a complete self-gift between spouses, so that sexuality has an inherent meaning and language that the Church's teachings honor and protect, and a woman can explain that the Church takes sex more seriously, not less, than the culture, seeing in it a profound meaning that is honored when it expresses the total married love it was made for. This means a woman explains the Church's high view of the meaning of the body and sexuality, so that she presents the teachings as protecting the profound meaning of sexual union rather than suppressing it. The woman who explains the meaning of the body and sexuality shows the Church honoring sex as deeply meaningful. The meaning of the body and sexuality in the Church's vision is a total, faithful, life-giving love, so that a woman presents the teachings as honoring the profound meaning of the sexual union.

Marriage as a Total, Faithful, Fruitful Gift

A woman can explain that the Church upholds marriage as a total, faithful, and fruitful self-gift, a permanent one-flesh union open to life, which is why she teaches as she does on its permanence and meaning. The Church's teaching on marriage follows from her vision of it as a total, faithful, and fruitful self-gift, the becoming of one flesh described in Scripture, a permanent and exclusive union of a man and a woman open to the gift of life, so that the Church's teachings on the permanence of marriage, its exclusivity, and its openness to children all flow from this understanding of marriage as a complete and lifelong self-gift, and a woman can explain that these teachings protect the fullness of what marriage is meant to be, the total gift the culture often fears but the heart longs for. This means a woman explains marriage as a total, faithful, and fruitful gift from which the Church's teachings flow, so that she presents those teachings as protecting the fullness of marriage rather than restricting it arbitrarily. The woman who explains marriage as a total, faithful, fruitful gift reveals the vision behind the Church's teaching. Marriage as a total, faithful, fruitful gift is the Church's vision, so that a woman shows its teachings on permanence and openness to life flowing from this understanding.

CHAPTER FOUR

The Resurrection

Can a Reasonable Person Believe It?

Skeptics often ask how an educated, modern person can believe in something as seemingly impossible as a resurrection, and a woman does well to be able to show that belief in the Resurrection rests on real grounds and is not the credulity it is assumed to be. Understanding how to address the Resurrection equips a woman to defend the central claim of the faith.

This Jesus God raised up, and of that we all are witnesses. — Acts 2:32

Why the Resurrection Matters

A woman can explain that the Resurrection is not a peripheral miracle but the foundation of the faith, the event on which everything else depends. Before addressing whether the Resurrection can be believed, a woman can explain why it matters so much, for the Resurrection is not a peripheral miracle among others but the very foundation of Christianity, the event that vindicates Christ's claims and conquers death, so that if Christ rose, everything He taught is confirmed, and if He did not, the faith is in vain, and a woman can show that the Resurrection is the central claim on which the whole faith stands or falls, making it worth examining seriously rather than dismissing. This means a woman explains why the Resurrection matters, as the foundation on which the whole faith depends, so that she shows the questioner it is a claim worth examining seriously rather than a peripheral oddity. The woman who explains why the Resurrection matters shows it as the foundation of the faith. Why the Resurrection matters is that it is the foundation of Christianity, the event on which the whole faith stands or falls.

The Historical Case

A woman can point to the historical grounds for the Resurrection, the empty tomb, the transformed witnesses, and the rise of the Church, as real evidence worth weighing. Belief in the Resurrection rests on historical grounds a woman can point to, for there is real evidence to consider: the empty tomb that even opponents could not explain away, the many witnesses who claimed to see the risen Christ, the dramatic transformation of frightened disciples into bold martyrs willing to die for what they had seen, and the sudden rise of the Church, so that a woman can present the Resurrection not as a baseless claim but as an event supported by historical evidence worth weighing, inviting the questioner to consider the grounds rather than dismissing the claim in advance. This means a woman points to the historical case for the Resurrection, the empty tomb, the witnesses, the transformed disciples, and the rise of the Church, so that she presents it as supported by real evidence rather than mere credulity. The woman who presents the historical case shows the Resurrection rests on evidence worth weighing. The historical case for the Resurrection includes the empty tomb, the witnesses, and the transformed disciples, so that a woman presents it as grounded in real evidence.

The Witnesses Who Died for What They Saw

A woman can point especially to the witnesses who died for their testimony, for people may die for a belief they hold mistaken, but the apostles died for something they claimed to have seen with their own eyes. A particularly powerful point is the witnesses who died for what they saw, for while people throughout history have died for beliefs they sincerely but wrongly held, the apostles died for their claim to have actually seen the risen Christ with their own eyes, and people do not knowingly die for what they know to be a lie, so that the willingness of the witnesses to suffer and die rather than deny the Resurrection they claimed to have seen is strong evidence of their sincerity and of the reality of what they witnessed, a point a woman can press with force. This means a woman points to the witnesses who died for what they saw, so that she shows their willingness to die for their testimony as strong evidence they truly saw the risen Christ rather than invented him. The woman who points to the witnesses who died for what they saw presses strong evidence for the Resurrection. The witnesses who died for what they saw are strong evidence, for the apostles died for a claim to have seen the risen Christ, not a belief they could have known false.

CHAPTER FIVE

The Church's Failures

Hasn't the Church Done Terrible Things?

One of the most pointed objections is that the Church itself has done terrible things across history, and a woman must be able to respond honestly, neither denying real wrongs nor concluding that the sins of her members disprove the faith. Understanding how to handle this question requires both honesty about failure and clarity about what it does and does not prove.

But we have this treasure in jars of clay, to show that the surpassing power belongs to God and not to us. — 2 Corinthians 4:7

Honest About Real Wrongs

A woman answers this question first with honesty, acknowledging that members of the Church, including leaders, have indeed committed real and grievous wrongs. The only honest way to meet this objection is to acknowledge the real wrongs, for members of the Church, including clergy and leaders, have genuinely committed grave sins and crimes across history, and a woman does not defend the indefensible or pretend these did not happen, but acknowledges them honestly, for the credibility of her whole response depends on her willingness to admit the real failures rather than deny or excuse them, honesty about the wrongs being the necessary starting point. This means a woman is honest about the real wrongs committed by members of the Church, acknowledging them rather than denying or excusing them, so that she meets the objection with the honesty on which her credibility depends. The woman who is honest about real wrongs acknowledges the Church's failures rather than denying them. Honest about real wrongs means acknowledging the genuine sins committed by members of the Church, so that a woman does not defend the indefensible.

The Church Is Holy and Made of Sinners

A woman can explain that the Church is both holy, in her source and her gifts, and made of sinners, so that the failures of her members do not negate the holiness of what God gave. A key distinction is that the Church is at once holy and made of sinners, for the Church is holy in her origin, her teaching, her sacraments, and her saints, holy in what God has given her, yet she is made up of sinful human beings who often fail grievously to live up to that holiness, so that the treasure of the faith is carried in jars of clay, weak and fallible vessels, and a woman can explain that the sins of the Church's members, real as they are, are failures to live the faith rather than products of it, not negating the holiness of what God entrusted to her. This means a woman explains that the Church is both holy and made of sinners, so that she shows the failures of members as betrayals of the faith rather than its fruit, the holiness of what God gave not negated by human sin. The woman who explains the Church is holy and made of sinners distinguishes the faith from the failures of its members. The Church is holy and made of sinners, so that a woman shows its members' failures as betrayals of the faith rather than disproofs of it.

What Sin Does and Does Not Prove

A woman can show that the sins of the Church's members prove human weakness but not the falsehood of the faith, since the truth of the Gospel does not depend on the virtue of those who fail it. Finally, a woman can clarify what the sins of Christians do and do not prove, for they certainly prove that Christians are sinners in need of the grace they preach, but they do not prove the faith false, since the truth of the Gospel does not depend on the faithfulness of those who betray it, and the existence of hypocrites and sinners in the Church no more disproves Christianity than a broken law disproves justice, so that a woman can show that the failures, real and grievous as they are, are an argument against the people who sinned, not against the truth they failed to live. This means a woman clarifies what sin does and does not prove, so that she shows the failures of members prove human weakness but not the falsehood of the faith, whose truth does not rest on its members' virtue. The woman who clarifies what sin does and does not prove separates the failures of members from the truth of the faith. What sin does and does not prove is human weakness but not the faith's falsehood, so that a woman shows the Gospel's truth does not depend on the virtue of those who fail it.

CHAPTER SIX

Faith and Reason

Is Belief Anti-Science or a Crutch?

Many assume that faith is opposed to reason and science, a crutch for the weak-minded or a relic incompatible with an educated mind, and a woman does well to be able to show that faith and reason are allies and that belief is not the intellectual surrender it is assumed to be. Understanding how to address this reveals the deep compatibility of faith and reason.

For his invisible attributes... have been clearly perceived, ever since the creation of the world, in the things that have been made. — Romans 1:20

Faith and Science Are Not at War

A woman can explain that faith and science are not at war, for they address different questions and the Church has long held that truth cannot contradict truth. The assumption that faith and science are at war is historically and philosophically mistaken, for science and faith address different kinds of questions, science asking how the physical world works and faith asking why there is a world and what it means, so that they do not compete but complement, and the Church has long taught that since all truth comes from God, the truths of faith and the truths of science cannot ultimately contradict each other, a woman able to point out that many great scientists have been believers and that the supposed war between faith and science is largely a myth. This means a woman explains that faith and science are not at war but address different questions, so that she shows their compatibility and dispels the myth of their conflict. The woman who explains faith and science are not at war shows their compatibility rather than conflict. Faith and science are not at war, so that a woman shows they address different questions and that truth cannot contradict truth.

Faith Is Not the Opposite of Reason

A woman can show that faith is not the opposite of reason but reasonable, resting on evidence and argument rather than being a blind leap or an intellectual surrender. Against the charge that faith is the opposite of reason, a woman can show that genuine faith is reasonable, resting on evidence, argument, and the reliable grounds of belief rather than being a blind leap against the facts, for the faith has a long tradition of rigorous intellectual engagement and holds that God can be known in part through reason, so that believing is not an abandonment of the mind but an act that engages it, and a woman can present faith as reasonable conviction rather than the intellectual surrender its critics assume. This means a woman shows that faith is not the opposite of reason but reasonable, resting on evidence and argument, so that she presents belief as engaging the mind rather than abandoning it. The woman who shows faith is not the opposite of reason presents belief as reasonable rather than blind. Faith is not the opposite of reason, so that a woman shows it rests on evidence and engages the mind rather than being a blind leap.

Belief Is Not Merely a Crutch

A woman can answer the charge that faith is only a crutch by showing that the truth of a belief does not depend on whether it comforts, and that faith often demands hard things rather than merely consoling. The claim that faith is merely a crutch for the weak can be answered by pointing out that whether a belief comforts has nothing to do with whether it is true, for a true thing may also be comforting, and the comfort of a belief does not make it false any more than the discomfort of a truth makes it false, and moreover genuine faith is often not a comfortable crutch at all but a demanding call that requires sacrifice, repentance, and hard obedience, so that a woman can show that faith is not merely wish-fulfillment but a response to truth that often asks difficult things rather than simply consoling. This means a woman answers the crutch objection by showing that comfort does not determine truth and that faith often demands hard things, so that she refutes the idea that belief is mere wish-fulfillment. The woman who shows belief is not merely a crutch refutes the charge of wish-fulfillment. Belief is not merely a crutch, so that a woman shows comfort does not determine truth and that faith often demands hard things rather than only consoling.

CHAPTER SEVEN

The Question You Did Not Expect

A Method for Anything

No woman can prepare for every possible question, and sooner or later she will be asked something she has never considered, so she needs not only answers but a transferable method for handling any question, including one she cannot answer. Understanding a method for the unexpected question frees a woman from the fear of being caught off guard.

Settle it therefore in your minds not to meditate beforehand how to answer, for I will give you a mouth and wisdom. — Luke 21:14-15

Stay Calm and Ask Questions

Faced with an unexpected question, a woman stays calm and asks questions of her own, drawing out what the person really means and buying herself time to think. When a woman is asked something she did not expect, her first move is to stay calm and ask questions, for rather than panicking or blurting an answer, she can respond with genuine curiosity, asking the person what they mean, why they ask, or what lies behind the question, which both draws out the real concern and gives her time to think, so that asking questions turns an intimidating challenge into a conversation and often reveals that the real question is different from the one first asked, calm inquiry being her best first response. This means a woman stays calm and asks questions when faced with an unexpected challenge, so that she draws out the real concern and gives herself time to think rather than panicking or blurting an answer. The woman who stays calm and asks questions turns an intimidating challenge into a conversation. Stay calm and ask questions is the first move for an unexpected question, so that a woman draws out the real concern and gives herself time to think.

Be Honest and Promise to Find Out

When a woman truly does not know the answer, she falls back on honesty, admitting she does not know and promising to find out, which keeps her integrity and the conversation intact. For the unexpected question she genuinely cannot answer, a woman relies on the honesty she has already learned, admitting plainly that she does not know but will find out, for this honest admission preserves her integrity, avoids the trap of bluffing, and keeps the conversation open and the relationship intact, so that even a question that completely stumps her need not defeat her, since I do not know but I will find out is always an available and honorable response that turns an unanswerable question into a reason to continue the conversation. This means a woman falls back on honesty when she cannot answer an unexpected question, admitting she does not know and promising to find out, so that she keeps her integrity and the conversation intact rather than bluffing.

The woman who is honest and promises to find out handles even the question that stumps her. Be honest and promise to find out is the fallback for any unanswerable question, so that a woman keeps her integrity and the conversation open.

Trust God in the Moment

Underlying every method is a woman's trust that God is with her in the moment, giving her words and wisdom, so that she faces even the hardest question without fear. Beneath all technique lies the deepest resource for handling any question, a woman's trust that God is with her in the moment, for Christ promised to give His followers words and wisdom when they are called to answer, so that a woman can face any question, even one she did not expect and cannot fully answer, without fear, relying not only on her preparation but on the help of God who is with her as she speaks, this trust freeing her from the anxiety of needing to handle everything in her own strength. This means a woman trusts God in the moment as the deepest resource for any question, so that she faces even the unexpected and the hard without fear, relying on His help rather than her own strength alone. The woman who trusts God in the moment faces any question without fear. Trust God in the moment is the deepest resource for handling any question, so that a woman faces even the unexpected without fear, relying on His help.

CONCLUSION

Meet the Hard Questions with Peace

The woman who dreaded the hard questions now has thought-through responses and a method for the rest. We have seen how to meet the problem of suffering with honesty, free will, and the God who suffered with us; how to explain that Catholics honor but do not worship Mary and the saints, asking their prayers; how to present the Church's teaching on sex and marriage as a positive vision rather than arbitrary rules; how to show that belief in the Resurrection rests on real historical grounds; how to be honest about the Church's failures while showing what they do and do not prove; how to defend the compatibility of faith with reason and science; and how to handle any unexpected question by staying calm, asking questions, being honest, and trusting God.

Running through all of it is a single freedom: to meet the hard questions without fear. A woman armed with honest responses to the common objections, and a method for the rest, need not dread the difficult conversations or be overwhelmed by them, for she can engage them with calm, honesty, and the confidence that God is with her.

So meet the hard questions with peace. When suffering is raised, honor the pain and point to the Cross. When Mary and the saints are questioned, explain honor and intercession, not worship. When the Church's teachings on sex and marriage are challenged, reveal the beautiful vision behind them. When the Resurrection is doubted, present the real evidence. When the Church's failures are raised, be honest, and show what sin does and does not prove. When faith is called anti-science or a crutch, show that faith and reason are allies. And when a question comes that you did not expect, stay calm, ask questions, be honest, and trust God. You do not need to fear the hard questions. Meet them, without fear, for the Spirit of your Father is speaking through you.

✦ ✦ ✦

Handling Hard Questions Without Fear is part of The Daily Bread Library.