THE DAILY BREAD

The Daily Bread

No Neutral Ground

A FORMATION BOOK BY

Kendall Peterson

The Everyday Apostle

A Daily Bread Formation Book The Everyday Apostle

A Note Before You Begin

This book is going to make some men uncomfortable. Not because it is going to be harsh or preachy, but because it is going to name something that most of us have been quietly relying on for years without examining it: the comfortable assumption that most of our life does not really count, spiritually speaking. That the things we do between Sunday Mass and the next Sunday Mass exist in a kind of moral and spiritual middle distance, not exactly holy, not exactly sinful, just ordinary, just life, just the stuff that fills the hours.

That assumption is wrong. And the cost of it, paid quietly, over years, in the slow narrowing of a man′s soul, is higher than most of us have allowed ourselves to calculate.

This book is not asking you to become anxious about every move you make. It is asking you to stop pretending that most of your moves do not matter. Those are not the same thing, and the difference between them is the difference between a man who is exhausted by his faith and a man who has been set free by it.

Part One: The Zone We All Prefer

There is a version of the Catholic life that most men find deeply appealing, even if they have never articulated it to themselves. It works like this. There are the religious things: Mass on Sunday, Confession occasionally, prayers at meals if the kids are watching, maybe a retreat once a year if someone drags you to one. These things count. God is watching, the stakes are real, and a man tries to bring his best self to them. And then there is everything else: the job, the commute, the game on Saturday, the way you talk with your friends, the things you watch when the house is quiet, the thoughts that show up uninvited. These things exist in a different zone. Not sinful, exactly. Just normal. Just life. God is not particularly present in them and they do not particularly concern Him.

This arrangement is appealing for obvious reasons. It keeps the zone of spiritual accountability small and manageable. It means that the vast majority of a man′s hours, the ones that feel the most ordinary, the most irreducibly human, are essentially free from the weight of any larger meaning. You can be a serious Catholic on Sunday and a basically secular man from Monday through Saturday, and the math works out fine because those are different compartments.

The only problem is that this arrangement is a fiction. Not a small or harmless fiction, but a foundational one, because once a man has accepted it he has handed the enemy the key to most of his life and called it freedom.

Part Two: What Christ Actually Said

Jesus was not subtle about this. In the twelfth chapter of Matthew, in the middle of a heated exchange with Pharisees who were trying to trap him, he says something that does not get nearly enough attention: whoever is not with me is against me, and whoever does not gather with me scatters.

There is no third option in that sentence. There is no with me but mostly neutral. There is no kind of with me on the days it feels relevant. There is with me, and there is against me, and the absence of a deliberate with me functions as an against me whether the man intends it that way or not.

A few chapters later, in the same Gospel, Jesus says something even more specifically uncomfortable: men will give account on the day of judgment for every careless word they have spoken. The Greek word translated as careless is argon. It means unproductive, without purpose, doing no work. The judgment is not only on the vicious word or the lie. It is on the word that accomplished nothing, that built no one up, that pointed nowhere. If every careless word is accountable, then the idea that our ordinary speech exists in a neutral zone where God is not particularly interested begins to look very difficult to sustain.

The Book of Revelation adds something that should unsettle any man who has made peace with the middle. In the letter to the church at Laodicea, God says: I know your works, that you are neither cold nor hot. I wish you were either cold or hot. But because you are lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I will spit you out of my mouth. The neutral zone, the comfortable middle, the man who is not really for or against anything, is not tolerated as a third category. He is the one found most intolerable.

And Paul, in his letter to the Colossians, frames the whole of ordinary life without exception: whatever you do, whether in word or deed, do it all in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God the Father through him. Whatever you do. Not whatever explicitly religious thing you do. Not whatever you do in church or in prayer. Whatever you do, which means the meeting, the meal, the drive home, the conversation, the choice of what to watch, the words that come out of your mouth when something goes wrong. All of it done in the name of the Lord Jesus. All of it.

The zone does not exist. It never did. We invented it because we needed it, because the alternative requires something we were not sure we wanted to give. But the comfort we have purchased with it has cost us more than we know.

Part Three: The Enemy's Preferred Strategy

C.S. Lewis understood this better than almost anyone writing in the twentieth century. In The Screwtape Letters, the senior demon Screwtape is advising his junior nephew Wormwood on how to secure the damnation of the man Wormwood has been assigned to corrupt. At one point, Screwtape reveals the strategy that works most reliably: the safest road to hell is the gradual one, the gentle slope, the soft underfoot, no sudden turnings, no milestones, no signposts.

The enemy is not primarily interested in turning good men into dramatically evil ones. That is loud, it attracts attention, it sometimes produces the kind of crisis that drives a man to his knees and back to God. What the enemy wants is something quieter and more durable: the man who never quite makes a serious decision either way. The man who is too busy to pray but not busy enough to notice the cost. The man who has a few areas of his life he keeps private from God and calls them normal. The man who has accepted without examination the idea that most of what he does has no spiritual weight.

Screwtape calls this the Nothing. Not violence, not dramatic vice, but the steady cultivation of emptiness. The man whose life is filled with things that mean nothing, produce nothing, point nowhere, and in which God is simply not a present reality. That man does not feel like he is losing anything. He feels like he is just living his life. That feeling is the achievement. The gradual slope is effective precisely because it does not feel like a slope.

The concept of no neutral ground is the direct answer to this strategy. It wakes a man up to what is actually happening in the ordinary hours. It refuses the comfort of the zone. It says: every hour of your life is being lived in one direction or another, and the direction is being determined whether or not you are paying attention. The only question is whether you will be the one choosing it.

Part Four: Everything Counts

If the zone does not exist, then something follows that is either terrifying or liberating depending on how you receive it: everything counts.

The Tuesday morning counts. The commute counts. The way you talk to the person at the counter counts. What you do with the forty-five minutes after your family has gone to sleep counts. The conversation you choose to have and the one you choose to avoid both count. The thoughts you entertain and the ones you dismiss count. The language you use when you are with your friends and no one is grading you counts. The way you treat someone who cannot do anything for you counts. The thing you watch, alone, when no one is watching you counts.

This does not mean that every one of these moments is a dramatic moral confrontation requiring maximum spiritual effort. It means that every one of them is an expression of something, an orientation, a direction. Every act either moves toward God or away from him. Every word either builds or diminishes. Every choice either reflects a man who belongs to Christ or one who is still trying to carve out territory that belongs to himself. There is no third category of acts that simply exist without meaning anything.

The implications of this are not small. If everything counts, then the five days between Sundays are not a spiritual waiting room. They are the primary content of a man's life before God. The retreat is important, but the man who had the retreat went back to work on Monday, and what he does on Monday in light of what happened on Saturday is the real measure of whether the retreat did anything. The sacraments matter enormously, but the man who received the Eucharist this morning is now in a meeting, and how he conducts himself in that meeting is part of the same spiritual reality as what happened at the altar. The faith does not pause when a man walks out of the church building. It either continues, or it reveals itself to have been only a performance.

Part Five: The Morning Offering

If everything counts, then how does a man live that without collapsing under the weight of it? The Church has a practical answer that is so old and so simple that it is easy to dismiss, but it solves the problem directly.

The Morning Offering is a prayer, made at the start of the day, in which a man offers the whole day to God. Everything in it: the work, the difficulty, the conversations, the small choices, the fatigue, the moments of patience and the moments of failure. All of it placed on the altar before the day begins.

When a man makes this offering genuinely, something changes about the structure of the day. He is not deciding, moment to moment, to make each individual act an act of worship. He has already done that. He has drawn the circle around the whole day and placed it before God, and everything inside that circle now belongs to God in a way it did not before. The difficult meeting is not suddenly enjoyable, but it is being offered. The patience required at the dinner table when everyone is tired and nobody is at their best is not suddenly effortless, but it is being offered. The Morning Offering does not make the day easy. It makes it purposeful. And it resolves, in advance, the question of whether what a man does with his ordinary hours matters to God. He has already answered that question. He told God yes, this matters, take it, before he even got up.

The practical mechanics of this are minimal. The traditional text of the Morning Offering takes about thirty seconds to pray. What matters is not the specific words but the genuine act of handing the day over rather than just starting it. A man who prays this prayer honestly, who actually means what he is saying rather than reciting it as one more item on a spiritual checklist, has done something more significant than it looks.

He has refused the zone. He has said, at the beginning of the day, that there is no part of what follows that will exist outside of God′s presence and purposes.

Over time, this practice changes a man. Not dramatically, not all at once, but in the gradual way that any consistent orientation changes the interior landscape. The man who has been offering his days to God for a year is a different man than he was when he started, not because he has had any particular mystical experience, but because he has stopped treating most of his life as spiritually irrelevant. He has allowed what is real to be real.

Part Six: Where This Shows Up

The concept of no neutral ground is abstract until it meets specific territory. What follows is not a comprehensive map. It is a handful of domains where men most commonly maintain the fiction of the zone, and where waking up to the truth of it tends to change something.

At Work

Most Catholic men spend more waking hours at work than anywhere else. Most treat those hours as belonging to an entirely different category from their spiritual life. The job is secular, the faith is personal, and the two coexist in the same man without much interaction.

But the job is where a man exercises the most consistent power he will ever have over other people. He decides whether those under him are treated with dignity or used as tools. He decides whether he is honest in his dealings or whether he cuts the corners that no one will detect. He decides whether the culture of his workplace becomes slightly more human because he is in it or slightly less. He decides whether the person who serves him lunch is seen or invisible.

None of these decisions are neutral. The man who treats everyone in his workplace with genuine respect because he believes each of them is made in the image of God is doing something different from the man who is merely polite when it is convenient. The man who is honest in a transaction where dishonesty would go undetected and benefit him is making a choice that counts. The man who uses his position to diminish someone who cannot push back has not found neutral territory. He has done something, and it points somewhere.

In Marriage and the Home

The home is where the no neutral ground concept is most personal and most uncomfortable, because the people most affected by it are the ones a man loves most and cannot avoid seeing every day.

The small choices in a marriage are not small. Whether a man comes home and actually arrives, present and attentive, or comes home and occupies the house while being absent in every way that matters, that is a choice. It points somewhere. Whether he leads his family in faith or outsources that entirely to his wife and the school, leaving her to carry the spiritual life of the home alone while he watches from a comfortable distance, that is a choice. It points somewhere. Whether his children grow up experiencing their father as a man who prays, who speaks God into their ordinary days, who places his hands on their heads and blesses them, or whether they grow up with a father who believes what the Church teaches but keeps it mostly private, that is a choice. It points somewhere.

This is not guilt. It is clarity. The man who has been treating his home as a spiritual neutral zone is not a bad man. He is a man who has been working with a false map. The moment he sees it clearly, he has a different set of options. He can keep the map. Or he can start making different choices.

The Words You Choose

Language is one of the clearest daily expressions of what a man actually values, and it is one of the areas where the neutral zone defense is most confidently applied. It is just how I talk. Words do not mean anything. Everyone talks this way.

They are not just how you talk. They are not neutral. They mean something, and the habit of speaking in a particular way forms the interior life in a particular direction over time.

There is a specific kind of casual profanity that most men have absorbed as a marker of authenticity, a way of signaling that they are regular and unaffected and not trying to impress anyone. The argument is that men who watch their language are performing, and men who do not are being real. This has it almost exactly backward. The man who has trained himself to speak with care and precision is not suppressing himself. He is expressing himself more completely. Profanity is frequently the lazy word, the easy reach, the thing that fills space without doing any real work. The man who says what he actually means has usually found that he does not need it much.

James understood this in a way that should make any man who has dismissed the question think again. In the third chapter of his letter, he describes the tongue as a fire that sets the whole course of life ablaze, a restless evil full of deadly poison, and then he notes the particular absurdity of using the same mouth to bless God and curse men made in God′s image. He is not writing about extreme cases. He is writing about the ordinary human tongue, used in ordinary ways, producing ordinary damage. The spring does not produce both fresh water and salt water. The fig tree does not bear olives. And the man who receives the Eucharist and then uses the Lord′s name as a curse twenty minutes later in traffic has said something about what he actually believes about both.

This deserves a particular note about blasphemy, because it is in a different category from general profanity and the distinction matters. The casual use of Christ′s name or God′s name as an expletive is not edgy or irreverent in an interesting way. It is the specific sin the second commandment was written to address, the treating of what is most sacred as most disposable, and it trains the interior life toward a particular kind of carelessness about God that extends far beyond the moment of speaking. A man who wants to take seriously the idea that nothing in his life is neutral might start by looking at what comes out of his mouth when he hits his thumb or sits in traffic or reacts to the news. What comes out without effort is what lives inside. And what lives inside is either being formed toward God or away from him.

The standard Paul gives in Ephesians is more useful than a list of prohibited words, because it reframes the question entirely: let no unwholesome talk come out of your mouths, but only what is helpful for building others up according to their needs. The question is not whether a word is on a list. It is whether what you are about to say will do something good for someone. That is a much more interesting and much more demanding standard, and it applies to the locker room and the job site and the group chat just as much as it applies to the church pew.

Leisure and Consumption

What a man does with his free time is not free from meaning. The content he consumes, the hours he gives to screens, the things he chooses to fill the space with when no one is assigning his time, all of it is either building something or eroding something. There is no passive gear.

This is not an argument against rest or enjoyment. Rest is necessary and good. The Sabbath is a commandment, not a suggestion, and it carries within it the recognition that human beings are not machines and that delight is part of the life God made for us. The question is not whether a man enjoys himself. It is what his enjoyment is doing to him.

The man who fills every margin of his life with content that is purely consumptive, that demands nothing of him, that leaves him slightly more numb and slightly less present each time, is not resting. He is eroding. The man who has normalized entertainment that degrades women, that coarsens the imagination, that he would be unwilling to watch with his wife or his daughter sitting next to him, has not found neutral territory. He has made choices about what he is willing to let into his interior life, and those choices are forming him in a direction, whether he is paying attention to that direction or not.

This applies with particular force to pornography, because no other form of consumption does more consistent damage to more Catholic men while being more thoroughly defended as a private matter that does not affect anyone else. It affects the man who uses it, in specific and documented ways, on his capacity for real intimacy, on his perception of the women around him, on his ability to be present to his wife as a person rather than a body. It is not neutral. There is no version of it that is neutral. The man who has been telling himself that this is a private reservation that does not count is one of the men this book is written for.

The Interior Life

The thoughts a man entertains, the resentments he nurses, the interior monologue he has been running about specific people in his life, the imagined conversations in which he is always right and whoever wronged him is always reduced, none of this happens in a neutral zone. The interior life is where the battle is most often won or lost, precisely because it is invisible and therefore easy to exempt from scrutiny.

Jesus was consistent and specific about this. Anger toward a brother is in the same category as murder. Looking at a woman with lust is adultery of the heart. The standard he sets operates at the level of the interior, not the external act, which means the interior is where the formation has to happen. The man who behaves well externally while running a corrosive interior life has found a sophisticated version of the zone. He has made it very small and put it somewhere no one can see it. But it is still there. And it is still pointing somewhere.

Part Seven: The Trap to Avoid

At some point in reading this, a certain kind of man will begin to feel the weight of it pressing into anxiety. Every moment counts. Everything I do matters. I am either glorifying God or serving the enemy in everything I say and think and choose. That is an overwhelming amount of responsibility for a man who is already tired.

This response is understandable and worth naming directly, because it points toward a real spiritual danger called scrupulosity, the excessive and anxious self-examination that turns the spiritual life into a performance review and leaves a man more focused on himself than on God. Scrupulosity is not holiness. It is a distortion of holiness, one that produces paralysis, guilt, and ultimately a self-absorption that is its own form of turning away from God.

The concept of no neutral ground, received correctly, does not produce scrupulosity. It produces freedom. The difference is this: the anxious man is trying to make every moment perfect through his own effort, monitoring himself constantly, terrified of falling short, unable to rest because rest feels like failure. The free man has offered his day to God at the beginning of it and is trying to live it in that offering, without needing to audit every step. He trusts that God is present in the ordinary, that the Morning Offering covers what his conscious attention misses, and that the Examen at the end of the day is the place to review and learn, not the moment-by-moment anxiety of a man who has made his spiritual life a performance.

The man who understands that everything counts does not carry more weight. He carries the same weight he always did, but he finally understands what it is for. That is not a burden. That is orientation. And orientation, after years of living without it, feels very much like being set free.

Part Eight: The Reservation

Most men reading this book have one. A specific area of life that has been quietly walled off from the logic of discipleship, where the rules of the ordinary Catholic life do not quite apply, where what happens there is understood to be private, personal, and essentially between the man and himself.

It might be what he does late at night when the house is quiet. It might be the way he talks and thinks about a particular person he has not forgiven. It might be a habit he has made peace with because naming it as a problem would require doing something about it. It might be the financial decisions he makes that his wife does not know about. It might be the version of himself that exists at work, where the faith stays in the car and the man operates by entirely different rules.

The reservation is the zone made small and specific. The man has not abandoned the faith broadly. He has simply identified one room and decided it does not apply there. He may not even be fully conscious of having made this decision. The reservation often develops gradually, through a series of small accommodations, until it is simply the way things are.

The concept of no neutral ground does not demand that the reservation be eliminated overnight. It demands that the man look at it honestly and stop calling it neutral. The territory he has walled off is not neutral. It is the place where the enemy has been most effective, precisely because the man agreed not to look there. The moment he looks, with honesty and without self-condemnation, he has already done something important. He has refused the fiction. What follows that refusal will vary from man to man. But it begins with seeing it clearly.

Part Nine: Why This Is Good News

Everything this book has said so far could sound like bad news. More is required of you than you thought. The areas of your life you assumed were exempt are not. The zone does not exist. That is a lot of ground you thought was yours that turns out not to be.

But here is what all of it actually means: your life matters. All of it. The Tuesday morning matters. The commute matters. The way you speak to the person who cannot do anything for you matters. The patience you manage or fail to manage at the dinner table matters. The thought you dismiss and the one you hold onto matters. Every ordinary hour of your ordinary life is part of something real and large and significant, and the God who made you is present in all of it, not just the elevated parts.

Most men live with a quiet suspicion that their life is not particularly important in the larger scheme of things. They have no dramatic conversion story. They have not been called to anything that looks like greatness by any standard they have been offered. They go to work, they come home, they try to love their family, they make mistakes, they try again. It does not feel like much.

The concept of no neutral ground says something very different. It says that the faithfulness exercised in that ordinary day is the primary material of a life before God. That the patience practiced in small things is the same virtue that would hold under pressure in large ones. That the man who has been offering his ordinary days to God for twenty years has been building something real, something that is visible from wherever God sees from, even when it is invisible from anywhere a man can stand.

The disciples walking to Emmaus did not know they were walking toward an encounter with the Risen Christ. They thought they were just walking home, disappointed and finished, on an ordinary road. The encounter did not wait for a more significant moment. It happened in the ordinary one, because the ordinary one was the only one available, and it was enough. Every ordinary moment is enough, when it is offered. That is the whole argument of this book. Nothing is neutral. Everything counts. And that is not a burden. It is the most encouraging thing a man can be told about the life he is actually living.

A Closing Word

Start tomorrow morning. Before anything else, before the phone, before the news, before the first obligation of the day arrives, take thirty seconds and offer the day to God. Not because you have it together or because the day will go well or because you are confident in what it holds. Offer it because it is His anyway, because you have just finished reading a book that told you nothing in it is neutral, and because you would rather be the one deciding which direction it points than cede that decision by default.

The man who does this consistently, over months and then over years, will find that something has changed. Not that his life has become more religious in the obvious sense, more visibly pious or more removed from the ordinary world. He will find that the ordinary world has become more charged, more significant, more full of the presence of a God who was always there and is only now being noticed. The Tuesday morning will still feel like a Tuesday morning. But he will know what it is for.

That is enough. That is everything. Go and live it.